V. 5, 6. David was the offspring of lawful and honourable marriage; nothing is hinted against his father Jesse in the sacred oracles, and he repeatedly speaks of his mother as the hand-maid of the Lord: yet having received from his parents Adam's fallen nature, with all its evil propensities, he confesses he was conceived and shapen in iniquity. His late dreadful fall evinced the depravity of his heart; and in these instances he had only acted according to its corrupt bias; being in himself naturally prone to rebellion against God. This he confessed in deep humiliation; yet it by no means followed that the Lord should relax in his requirements, because of the depraved propensities of his apostate creatures. His perfect law requires entire truth, purity, and love in the heart and conduct; and in this alone he delighteth; and sincerity from the inmost soul, in repentance, faith, and renewed obedience, is requisite even according to the Gospel: this the Psalmist had been taught, before his transgressions: "in the hidden part the Lord had made him to know wisdom," which was a great aggravation of his guilt, in that he sinned against knowledge, conscience, and the peculiar obligations conferred on him. If we read the clause in the future tense, as in our translation, it expresses the Psalmist's hope that the Lord would, notwithstanding his guilt and depravity, graciously communicate to him true wisdom; and enable him to know and do what he required and delighted in. 'I am so far from representing my innate propensity to evil, as an excuse for what I have done; that I confess the consideration of it ought to have made me the more watchful and diligent to suppress those bad inclinations which I knew to be so natural.—I am amazed at my folly, that I should be so careless; when I know that thou requirest us, not to entertain, with the least kindness, those first motions which we find in our thoughts and desires after any evil, but uprightly to oppose them.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 7. The hyssop, employed in sprinkling the blood of the sacrifices, (as it is generally thought;) in the leper's offerings when cleansed; and in sprinkling the water of purification, (Marg. Ref.) represented the efficacy of faith, in applying to the soul the blood of Christ for pardon, and the influences of the Holy Spirit for sanctification. Thus David prayed to be completely cleansed from all sin, both as to its guilt and pollution, that he might be as if he had never sinned: and thus believers will at length be made equal to the angels, who are arrayed in spotless robes of innocence, whiter than the snow itself.

V. 8. A man who has carelessly fallen from a precipice and broken his bones, when he comes to himself will feel exquisite torture, and be utterly disabled for the present; and probably will be reminded of his fall as long as he lives. Thus David had, through unwatchfulness, been induced to commit the most heinous wickedness: and though, by the abundant mercy of God, he was preserved from that final destruction which he had justly merited; yet he experienced such anguish of conscience, and such a sense of the divine displeasure, and met with such severe rebukes from the Lord, that he felt as if all his bones had been broken: he was full of pain; he was crippled, and disabled from his former employments. He hoped, however, that the God of salvation would restore his peace and comfort; and thus set his broken bones, and cause them to rejoice.

V. 9. 'The soul, still restless and uneasy, reiterates her request, that God would not only cease to behold her iniquity for the present, as a man who turneth away his face from a writing, but that he would not behold it any more, as a man who blotteth out what is written, so that it can never be read again.' V. 10. The production of a holy disposition in a sinner's heart: the forming him to a spiritual judgment and taste, a submissive will, a pure imagination and well regulated affections, is a new creation: even as if Satan, by almighty power, should again be made a holy angel. This state of the understanding and heart is "a right spirit," it is reasonable and excellent; such as all intelligent beings should possess, and absolutely necessary to true liberty and felicity. Man originally possessed it: but it was lost by the fall: and where it is again produced, it is the renewal of a right spirit. This is begun in regeneration, and carried on by progressive sanctification, and completed in glory. When the sinner feels such a change to be necessary, and that he is unable to work it in himself: and when he reads the promises of God to this purpose, (Ezek. xxxvi. 25—27.) he asks it from God: and every discovery of remaining sinfulness leads the believer to renew this supplication; and thus the change is gradually effected.—The margin, however, more exactly from the original, renders it, constant, "Renew a constant" or an established "spirit within me." Holy angels are established in a right spirit; and so are "the spirits of just men made perfect." Even on earth real Christians have in a measure this constant established spirit: but hypocrites are unstable. David had experienced the inconstancy of his heart; and was sensible, that even if pardoned and restored, he should, in case he were left to himself, be again drawn aside; and prayed earnestly for that constancy, which might enable him "with purpose of heart to cleave unto the Lord." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11. Eternal banishment from the gracious presence of God, under his wrath and curse, constitutes a principal part of the misery of hell: and something like this misery may be felt on earth, even by the believer, when, excluded from comfortable communion with God, he finds his heart oppressed with the sense or dread of deserved wrath. This heaviest of all afflictions David deprecated. The Spirit of God departed from Saul when he was rejected from being king; and David feared the same sentence for his more atrocious crimes, as in some respects they certainly were. All his sufficiency, as the prophet of God, as his anointed king, and as the Psalmist of Israel, was derived from the Holy Spirit: and all his comfort and usefulness must terminate, if the Holy Spirit should be finally taken from him. It is indeed, on scriptural ground, maintained, that the Spirit of life and sanctification is never finally taken from believers: but, even in this case, their comforts may expire in despondings, their credit in disgrace, and all their gifts and usefulness may wither and be lost to the end of life.

V. 12, 13. "The joy of God's salvation," arises from a persuasion and perception of the mercy and grace of God according to his promises, of the nature and glory of his salvation, as revealed in the Scriptures, of its suitableness to the sinner's wants, its freeness and sufficiency; from a prevailing confidence of an interest in it; and from communion with God and the exercise of faith, hope, admiring, adoring, grateful love, and all other holy affections, as springing from the Spirit of sanctification. The raptures and ecstasies peculiar to the prophets were of a very different nature, and arose from the sublime discoveries made to them in dreams or visions, and they did not always imply holiness of heart: whereas the joy of salvation is the common privilege of the regenerate, according to the degree of their grace, and belongs to none else.—This joy David had experienced, and he had lost it by sin: that loss he regrets; and he earnestly prays for the restoration of it: for it cannot subsist, unless the conscience be kept tender, the heart watchful and spiritual, and the will submissive; and unless communion with God be maintained, and the Holy Spirit not grieved by gross misconduct. But the royal penitent likewise feared, that even should he recover this holy joy, he should again lose it if left to himself; and therefore he earnestly prayed that God would uphold him with his free Spirit. The Holy Spirit may be thus called, because he is freely bestowed on sinners through the gracious Saviour: but this epithet seems rather to mean, that he sets the soul at liberty from sin and Satan; produces a noble, ingenuous, and liberal disposition, and teaches us to serve and worship God as children, and not as slaves. (Marg. Ref.) Thus comforted and upheld, he purposed to teach sinners the ways of God, of peace, and holiness; and by using his influence for this purpose, and warning and encouraging them by his experience, he trusted many would be led to "repent and turn to God, and do works meet for repentance."

V. 14. The guilt of murder as it were haunted David's mind, and he was still praying for the removal of it from his conscience. And if he might but obtain this blessing from the God of his salvation, though dreadful judgments had been denounced against him and his family for his crimes; he yet engaged to be open in vindicating the justice of God in them, connected with his own deep disgrace. Many expositors explain the words to mean, that he would celebrate that righteousness by which sinners, who believe, are accounted righteous before God, or the faithfulness of God to his promises.

V. 15. Conscious guilt had stopped David's mouth, when he attempted, as formerly, to show forth the praises of God, or to plead his cause: but he trusted that the comforts of his pardoning love, and the returning influences of his Holy Spirit, would open his mouth, and give him confidence and liberty upon such favourite themes.

V. 16. Murder and adultery were by the law punishable by death ; and therefore no sacrifices were appointed to be offered by those who were guilty of them. The Lord would not accept, and did not desire, any sacrifices in David's case : and indeed he had no delight in sacrifices and burnt-offerings for their own sake ; but merely as shadows of the true atonement, and expressions of a penitent believing thankful heart.

V. 17. The legal sacrifices were long after this continued, as types of the Redeemer's atoning sacrifice : nor can a broken heart do aught towards purchasing forgiveness. But a humble spirit, broken off from all self-dependence and the love of sin, and crushed down into deep self-abasement and abhorrence, is a spiritual sacrifice pleasing and honourable to God : for he who is enabled to present this oblation, unreservedly submits to the justice of God ; casts himself, without plea or excuse, upon his free mercy ; thankfully accepts of his salvation ; and will walk according to it, in all humble obedience, and patient submission to the will of God. This broken and contrite spirit man despises as mean and contemptible ; and the possessor is apt to deem it unmeet to be presented to his offended Sovereign : but God will never despise or reject such an unequivocal effect of his own renewing grace.

V. 18, 19. David feared lest his guilt should render him an Achan in the congregation of Israel : and therefore he concluded his penitential prayer, with entreating God to protect and prosper Zion ; that the ordinances of his house might be administered to his glory, and the edification of his people. For though the Lord delighted not in burnt-offerings, for their own sake : yet as they were typical of the Messiah's atonement ; as they subverted the interests of true piety, and were accompanied by other sacrifices of righteousness, he was pleased with them.—
' Thus it ought to be the fervent prayer of every man, especially in any exalted station, that no sins by him committed may any ways prejudice others, or obstruct the edification of the Church.' (Horne.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4.

If the most eminent believer ceases to watch and pray, Satan may obtain such advantages against him, that for the time he shall seem perfectly fascinated and stupified : but the Lord will at length, by rebukes or corrections, bring him to himself ; and the depth of his humiliation will be proportioned to the heinousness of his sins. But the hypocrite is durably callous ; and his religious profession and opinions are abused to excuse his crimes, and to buoy up his presumptuous confidence. The true penitent, even though before his fall he had been eminently holy and useful, has nothing to plead, except his own misery and the Lord's abundant mercy. For the more we are enabled to do in his service, the greater are our obligations : and our sins are the more aggravated when committed against knowledge, mercies, and vows ; when they do violence to the new nature and the strivings of the Holy Spirit ; and when they are inconsistent with our character and profession, and tend to dishonour the Gospel and mislead our brethren. The real penitent will be deeply humbled and afflicted, but he will not sink into despair ; and in proportion as he renounces every false confidence, the more earnestly will he call upon God to " have mercy on him, according to the multitude of his tender mercies." He longs to have the whole debt of his sins cancelled, and every stain cleansed. He would be thoroughly washed from his iniquities, till all his guilt and defilement be completely removed : but the hypocrite always has some secret reserves, and would spare some favourite lust. Whilst sinners conceal or palliate their sins, they are out of the way of mercy : but when they humbly and ingenuously plead guilty, and unreservedly confess their crimes, they may even plead that confession as a reason why they should be spared : for this yields the point in contest ; i. e. that the Lord might justly punish, and that salvation must be all of grace. When a load of guilt oppresses a man of a tender conscience, the recollection of his sins and their aggravations follows him into company and into retirement, it occurs to his mind in scenes of business and of pleasure, and even breaks his rest, and disquiets his dreams, so that " his sin is ever before him : " but slight convictions, where the heart is not broken, are soon shaken off ; and the wound is skinned over, but not cured. The true penitent considers every sin as rebellion against the authority and infinite Majesty of heaven. If he has been preserved from those crimes which evidently injure society, he reflects with shame upon the enmity and ingratitude of his heart against God, which have been manifested in his general conduct ; and on this account he thinks himself a chief sinner : but if guilty of grosser transgressions, he considers his rebellion against God in them far more enormous than any injury which he has done to men like himself. He is also ashamed of the folly of bestowing pains to hide those actions from men, which are done in the sight of his Lord and Judge : he pleads the cause of God against himself, and allows of the most humiliating charge in his word, as true in his own case : whilst they who excuse themselves,

PSALM LII.

David contrasts the deceit and malice of Doeg with the goodness of God, 1—4. He predicts Doeg's ruin, and the joy of the righteous, 5—7. He professes confidence in God, and that he shall praise him for ever, 8, 9.

often dare to arraign and censure the decisions and proceedings of the Almighty.

V. 5—13.

When the heart is deeply humbled on the recollection of heinous transgressions, the penitent is led to trace back the streams of actual sin to the fountain of original depravity, not to cavil or object with the infidel and the hypocrite, but for his own deeper humiliation: he compares the propensities of his heart with the holy law and glorious perfections of God; and perceiving the contrariety, “abhors himself, and repents in dust and ashes.” When he considers that “truth in the inward parts,” in which the Lord delighteth, and that wisdom that he teacheth, and how contrary he hath often acted to both, he is ashamed of his temper and conduct, and is led the more entirely to expect every thing good from the influences of divine grace, overcoming the tendency of corrupt nature. In short he feels his need of pardon and of holiness; he longs for peace of conscience and purity of heart; and his experience of his own utter inability to obtain them for himself puts vigour into his prayers to the Lord, to purge him by the blood and Spirit of Christ, “that he may be clean; to wash him, “that he may be whiter than snow;” to “cause him “to hear joy and gladness, that his troubled spirit “may rejoice;” and having pardoned all his sins, by almighty power “to create in him a clean heart, and re-“new a right spirit within him,” that for the future he may hate and flee from all sin. He longs for this renewal to holiness as much as for the joy of salvation; and to be upheld from falling, equally with the light of God's countenance, and the consolations of his Holy Spirit. Nothing so animates the soul to teach the ways of God to sinners, and to seek for their conversion, as a deep experience of the bitterness of sin, and of the freeness and pleasantness of the pardoning love of God: they therefore always form the most zealous preachers to others, who have themselves been most deeply humbled; and they are most earnest for the salvation of their fellow-sinners, who most value and rejoice themselves in the salvation of God.

rages the soul: but this excites more fervent prayers, and when mercy is bestowed by the God of salvation, such penitents will most abound in thankful praises. Yet conscious guilt stops the mouth, and the humbled sinner is afraid or ashamed to speak of his God, as in times past, until the impediment be removed by some tokens of pardoning love, and the comforts of the Holy Spirit. Such an one would do any thing, or part with any thing, to obtain pardon and peace; but human inventions are worthless, and even divine ordinances are no more than means of communicating the blessings procured by the sacrifice of Christ; and which can only be received by a broken and contrite heart, with which God is well pleased. No personal fears or troubles of conscience can render the gracious soul forgetful of the interests of the church, or indifferent about them: the humble believer and faithful minister often fear, lest their own misconduct should blast their endeavours for doing good: and whatever they suffer, or whatever become of them, they still desire and pray, that true religion may prevail, and that spiritual sacrifices may abound through Jesus Christ to the praise and glory of God. ‘O Lord, give us true repentance, for thy mercies’ sake; help us to offer the sacrifice of a contrite spirit; preserve us from hypocrisy and blood guiltiness, especially that of occasioning the ruin of immortal souls by our example or neglect; and enable us to walk with increasing watchfulness, and to pray more fervently for our fellow-Christians and fellow-sinners.’

NOTES.

PSALM LII. V. 1. (Notes, 1 Sam. xxii.) Doeg is here represented as boasting of his successful treachery and savage cruelty, in murdering a multitude of unarmed and unresisting priests, and of women and children; as if he had performed some great exploit: and perhaps he menaced David and his company with the same vengeance. But the Psalmist, by contrasting Doeg's malice and mischief with the persevering goodness of God, sharply reproved him: and in fact, relying on the faithful and merciful promises of God, he set him and his other enemies at defiance.

V. 2. Doeg appeared before Ahimelech with the semblance of piety; yet treacherously became his accuser and murderer. This unsuspected malice and cruelty were like a mortal blow given with a well-set razor, so as scarcely to be felt.

PSALM LIII.

The general corruption of mankind; the madness of persecutors; and the terrors that seize on them, 1—5. A prayer for the salvation of Israel, 6.

V. 3, 4. It appears that Doeg not only sought the favour of Saul, but entered cordially into the detestable service. His heart, being enmity against God, hated his priests and servants, because he had a rooted aversion to piety and holiness. He loved evil, lying, and murder, and gave them a decided preference to goodness, righteousness, and truth: for he took pleasure in gratifying his malignity and impiety, as others do in gratifying avarice or sensual lusts. Nor was this all: for he loved and preferred in others the same hateful dispositions in which he indulged himself; and by calumny and lies prepared the way for persecution and murder. Thus he resembled, and was in some respects a type of, those who saw and hated the holy Jesus, because they hated the Father that sent him, and accomplished his death by lying witnesses and virulent accusations.

V. 5. An accumulation of most expressive metaphors is here used, to mark the certainty of that dreadful punishment which awaited this prosperous and haughty persecutor.

V. 6, 7. The righteous, beholding the ruin of this vile transgressor, would reverence the divine justice, become more afraid of sin, and be confirmed in true religion: yet they would exult in beholding condign vengeance executed upon one who was become so execrable and terrible by his crimes; and express cordial satisfaction in observing the event of a man's trusting in wealth and prosperity, encouraging himself in wickedness, and renouncing God and setting him at defiance.

V. 8. A green, &c. The olive-tree produces the oil, which is useful to man, and was employed in the worship of God. (Note, Judges, ix. 9.) Thus David, being rooted in love to God's ordinances, would abide and be fruitful in his house: whilst Doeg, "who was detained before the LORD," became a fire-brand to destroy others and himself.

V. 9. The Psalmist praised God, as if his prediction had already been fulfilled; and he determined to wait still on his name. The Name of God is glorious and excellent, in the judgment of all his saints: and they all deem it right, reasonable, honourable, and profitable, to wait patiently his time, in his ways, for the performance of his promises.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is far worse to glory in, than to perpetrate, wickedness: yet many mighty men have been ambitious of being distinguished by doing extensive mischief, with valour, or crafty policy. Indeed poets, orators, and historians have generally celebrated those as heroes, whose conduct has been the reverse of the divine goodness, and the very counterpart of Satan's malice, pride, deceit, and murder; who have abused superior advantages and endowments, to devise and execute plans of more extensive devastation; or by slanders and treachery to excite war and bloodshed among those who were at peace. The words of a deceitful tongue are often, not only as a sharp razor, but more devouring than the sword; and numbers in all ages have loved evil more than good; and lies more than truth and equity. —But it is wonderful 'that any man should value himself for being able to do mischief, when God esteemeth it his glory to do good:' and his goodness will increase the condemnation of all those who are emboldened by it in committing iniquity: but it forms the security of those who depend on it and copy it as their example. —The believer foresees that God will cast down, sweep away, eradicate and extirpate from the earth, and destroy for ever in hell, those who make not him their strength, but idolize their wealth and prosperity, and who encourage themselves in wickedness: and no criminals will perish with greater exultation of the righteous than hardened persecutors. Their success is like the luxuriant growth of some poisonous plant, which it is a public service to destroy. But the righteous man is a fruitful olive-tree, planted in a good soil: he trusts in the everlasting mercy of God, and delights in his ordinances; and however he be now afflicted, (and thus conformed to the suffering Redeemer,) he will wait on the name of the Lord, and will praise him for ever. In expectation of this felicity, let us begin the work of heaven on earth; praying continually that we may only witness, but never share the perdition of the ungodly.

PSALM LIV.

David complains of his enemies, and prays for deliverance, 1—3. He glorifies in the help of God, predicts ruin to his foes, and vows sacrifices and praises, 4—7.

To the chief Musician on Neginoth, Maschil, A Psalm of David, ^a when the Ziphims came and said to Saul, Doth not David hide himself with us?

SAVE me, O God, ^b by thy name, and ^c judge me by thy strength.

NOTES.

PSALM LIII. Title. This psalm differs very little from the fourteenth; and it is not known, nor has it been conjectured with much probability, on what account, or for what reason, the same sentiments are repeated in almost the same words. The variations, however, are sufficient to show, that the psalm in one place was intentionally altered from that in the other; and it is probable, from some change in the Psalmist's circumstances, or some events which had occurred subsequent to its first publication. The word Mahalath seems to denote a hollow instrument of music, a flute or pipe; and Maschil or instructing, implies the scope of it, viz. an instruction or warning against impiety towards God, and rebellion against his anointed king.

V. 1—4. (Notes, &c. xiv.) The only variations in these verses are the change, in several instances, of one word for another of exactly the same import. 'Are not the workers of iniquity conscious, that they eat up my people,' &c.? Thus the last verse is rendered in some versions.

V. 5. This verse contains much more than the parallel one in the fourteenth psalm; while the sixth of that psalm is wholly omitted. The rebels who rose up against David's authority, chiefly because they hated his religion, and were instigated by the spirit of persecution, proved on trial very cowardly; for no doubt God was pleased to impress terror on their hearts, when there was no adequate danger. Thus the army of Absalom which encamped against David was easily routed, numbers fell in the forests, and being left unburied, their bones were scattered: and because God despised the impotent rage of this abandoned party, his servant easily put them to confusion. They were a sort of type of the Jewish persecutors of Christ and his disciples.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The folly of sinners greatly appears in their acting as if they could escape the notice of Omniscience, prosper in defiance of Omnipotence, or be happy in rebellion against the source of all felicity. They who go back from a religious profession, generally become most filthy, or malicious persecutors, who of all other sinners are most infatuated: for God hath despised, and will confound and destroy them; as he hath often scattered the bones of powerful armies who have encamped against his church. A guilty conscience and a dread of vengeance frequently fill the enemies of God with fears, where nothing formidable can be perceived; but at length their worst terrors will be awfully realized: and as the deliverance and prosperity of the church on earth will be attended with the ruin of all anti-christian opposers: so the eternal joys of the redeemed will be attended with the everlasting shame and misery of all their impenitent oppressors.

NOTES.

PSALM LIV. Title. (Notes, &c. 1 Sam. xxiii. 21—28.) This psalm seems to contain the prayer and confident expectation of David, in the extremity of danger; when the Ziphites led Saul and his army to the very spot where David and his small company lay concealed; and when, surrounded on every side by blood-thirsty deceitful foes, nothing but an extraordinary divine interposition could possibly preserve him. Viewed in this light, and compared with the event, it appears peculiarly interesting; and shows that the Psalmist's confidence in God and fervency in prayer, increased in proportion to the emergency.

V. 1. The honour of God, and of his holy name, was deeply concerned in David's preservation; as the Lord had expressly engaged to give him the kingdom. And as the Omnipotent Judge of all could not want power to defend his servant from the cruelty and iniquity of Saul and his party, and thus to vindicate his own glory: the Psalmist in assured faith appealed to his righteous decision, and applied for his effectual protection. His argument resembles that of Joshua.—“O LORD, what shall I say, when Israel turneth their backs on their enemies! For the Canaanites shall cut off our name from the earth: and what wilt thou do unto thy great name?” (Josh. vii. 8—10.)

V. 3. The Ziphites belonged to the same tribe with David; yet they acted as strangers: and Saul, the Lord's anointed king, and his party, were become most cruel and blood-thirsty tyrants: for they had “not set God before them.” Selah. Let that be noted.

V. 4. Uphold. Jonathan and some others adhered to David, and upheld his cause; and God would certainly favour them.

V. 5. Truth. In fulfilling his promises the God of truth would certainly cut off the enemies of his servant. (1 Sam. xxvi. 10.) This was well known; and therefore David only prayed for the accomplishment of the promises, attended with those circumstances from which it was inseparable. ‘The application to Christ and to Christians is plain and easy; for which reason our Church has appointed this psalm to be read on Good Friday.’ (Horne.)

V. 6. To offer thank-offerings and praises was right, pleasant, and acceptable to God.

V. 7. The words his desire are not in the original, either in this or in any of the similar passages. We may suppose that David, as well as Jeremiah, could say, “I have not desired the woful day, thou knowest.” But he was assured that he should witness the awful judgments of God on his enemies, as well as the performance of his engagements to him.

PSALM LV.

David prays in great distress and terror, 1—8. He describes the wickedness and predicts the ruin of his enemies, 9—15. He determines to continue in prayer; and confiding in God to deliver him and confound his foes, he exhorts others to trust in God, 16—23.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Our nearest relations may prove more unkind than strangers; they who ought to protect us may become our oppressors; and professors of true religion will generally behave to believers worse than heathens do. And looking unto David betrayed by the men of Judah, and to Jesus betrayed by his apostle, and delivered to death by the Jewish rulers and people, what can we expect from any who have “not set God before them,” except ingratitude, treachery, malice, and cruelty? But God is the helper of his people: he will favour and prosper those that uphold their souls, while he confounds their persecutors: and his truth is engaged to reward evil to their enemies. Let us then trust him and call upon him, when injured, or tempted: for his name's sake he will then save us, and plead our cause with all his power.—We should recollect past deliverances to encourage our faith and prayer in present trials: and it is good and acceptable for us to sacrifice freely our spiritual oblations of grateful praise for the past, whilst we wait for further mercies.—As the risen and ascended Jesus could adopt the Psalmist's words, and say, “He hath delivered me from all trouble, and mine eye hath seen his desire upon mine enemies;” so will his risen people at length be enabled to join in them. ‘Lord help us to bear our cross without repining, and at length bring us to behold and to share thy victories and glory.’

not guilty. Thus Christ was falsely accused by those who had taken counsel to put him to death.

V. 4—8. In general David showed the firmest courage in the most extreme dangers: but the unnatural rebellion of Absalom, which he knew to be the correction of his sin in the matter of Uriah, quite unmanned him; and he was filled with terror and consternation. Nay, he was become so weary of the treachery and ingratitude of men, and of the cares and disappointments of his high station, that he longed to have done with society, and to hide himself in some desert from the fury and fickleness of his people. He wished, in his haste, for the wings of the harmless dove, that he might fly away and be at rest; and his varied expressions, and the representation of the popular commotion as a violent tempest, show the vehement agitation of his mind. Yet in his more collected moments he could not approve of such a wish; he was not at liberty to leave his useful station; he could find no rest any where, but in God, with whom he might commune in the midst of society; and he must wait for his more perfect rest, till he had fully served his generation. 'These words describe the state of David's mind, when he went over the brook Cedron, and up mount Olivet, "weeping as he went," and expecting speedily to be cut off: they describe the agony of the Son of David, when he likewise went over the same brook Cedron, at the time of his passion, "when "his soul was sore amazed, and very heavy," and "exceeding sorrowful even unto death." (Horne.) It may be added, that at that awful crisis the Saviour also prayed, "If it be possible, let this cup pass from me; nevertheless, not my will but thine be done:" and David likewise speedily recovered his composure, and said, "Behold, here am I, let him do to me as seemeth good "unto him." (2 Sam. xv. 26.) Every circumstance concurs in fixing this period as the date of the psalm: though some think it was composed during the persecutions which David endured from Saul.

V. 9—11. David had rescued Jerusalem from the

VOL. II.—No. 14.

Jebusites: and it became "the holy city," when the ark of God was placed there: yet it was now become the seat of violence and strife. This he perceived at the breaking out of Absalom's rebellion, and therefore he would not venture to continue there: and when the usurper had got possession, mischief and sorrow, wickedness and guile, occupied the city in every part, parading it day and night, and guarding it against every approach of piety, equity, and loyalty, as against the most dangerous foes. David therefore prayed, that the Lord would render the devices of the usurpers a Babel, by confounding their language and counsels, and thus leaving them to disunion, and mutual jealousies and suspicions. This was granted, when Hushai's counsel was preferred to Ahithophel's; and when that crafty politician, the stay of the whole party, went and hanged himself. Thus the nation of the Jews, after they had rejected Christ, were destroyed by being divided: and Jerusalem, having become the scene of every enormity, was miserably desolated by the Romans.

V. 12—15. Ahithophel's treachery was peculiarly distressing to David; and it was the more galling for being wholly unexpected. So far from having been an avowed enemy, who now took occasion to reproach him and to exult in his calamities, or menace his life, Ahithophel had been David's counsellor and bosom-friend, and treated by him as an equal, or as one of his own rank: he had also been his chosen and pleasing companion in the exercises of religion, and in pious conversation. Yet this very man, without any affront or previous quarrel, became an apostate, and a traitor, and gave Absalom the most malicious and infernal counsel imaginable! Thus Christ was betrayed by one whom he had honoured as a companion, a disciple, and an apostle; who resembled Ahithophel in his crimes and in his doom: for both were speedily overtaken by divine vengeance, in the same dreadful manner. This was foretold by David concerning Ahithophel, and by Jesus concerning Judas: for the words are in the future, and more naturally signify a prediction, than an imprecation. (Marg. Ref.)

—† The sudden destruction of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, who, for stirring up rebellion against Moses and Aaron, “went down alive into the pit,” seems here alluded to; as the grand representation of the manner in which the bottomless pit shall one day shut her mouth for ever upon all the impenitent enemies of the true King of Israel and great high Priest of our profession.’ (Horne.)

V. 17. Probably this was David’s general practice; from which he was not diverted by any of his troubles, but was rather made more earnest in it. (Marg. Ref.) ‘I will never give over my importunity, till he graciously grant my petition, and send me relief.’ (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 18. As this verse is in the past tense, whilst those which precede and follow it are future, the Psalmist seems to refer to his former experience of the Lord’s goodness and faithful care of him; and thus to encourage himself and his friends to expect a happy event to their present perils. In former instances, when far superior forces had attacked him, God had delivered him in peace, and made him triumphant; for his invisible protectors and helpers were more numerous and powerful than all his visible foes. Thus our Lord said, “Thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to my Father, and he shall presently give me more than twelve legions of angels.” And angels terrified and drove away the Roman soldiers, rolled away the stone from the sepulchre, and attended his resurrection and ascension.

V. 19. He “who inhabiteth eternity,” hearing the prayers of his distressed servants, would certainly punish their persecutors; who had been hardened in impiety, by uninterrupted prosperity. Or, God would certainly afflict them, because they would not turn and fear him.

V. 20, 21. Absalom, or Abithophel, seems to have been here intended: but the character and language of crafty flattering courtiers and of malicious dissemblers, in all ages, is emphatically described. Thus Judas betrayed Christ, when he had said, “Hail, Master, and kissed him.”

V. 22. ‘Whatever God has given or allotted thee, commit it all to his keeping by faith and prayer.’ This is the way of peace and safety.

V. 23. Half, &c. Such persons, as are here described, generally come to a violent end, before half the years are elapsed which they might otherwise have been expected to live.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The most excellent persons have always experienced the basest treatment in this evil world: and the more any mere man hath resembled the Son of God in heavenly zeal and purity, the more hath he been traduced and hated by them whose crimes he opposed, or whose hypocrisy he detected. The clamours and oppression, the calumnies and malice, of ungodly men, may however be the more easily endured, if we possess peace of conscience, and a sweet sense of the divine favour. But when our sufferings from men excite in us the sense, or the dread, of the anger of our offended God; when a guilty conscience gives Satan advantage in assailing our peace, and sapping the foundations of our hope; we must needs “mourn in our complaint,” and the thoughts of our hearts will often become like the tempestuous waves of the restless ocean: so that in this case even eminent believers have been filled for a time with inexpressible horror and consternation. Yet none of them was ever so overwhelmed with terror and anguish as the holy Jesus was; when “it pleased the LORD to bruise him, to put him to grief, and to make his soul an offering for our sins.” But in “his agony he prayed more earnestly,” and was heard and delivered: and if we trust in his merits, and copy his example, we too shall be supported under all, and carried through all. They who are most conversant with mankind, will see the most to disquiet, discourage, and disgust them; if they have a spiritual judgment, and are labouring to do good. Disappointment and vexation, arising from the experience of the inconstancy, ingratitude, and treachery of mankind in general, will sometimes render them weary of the most eminent stations and honourable services; and make them long for retirement and obscurity, where they may no longer witness the miseries and crimes which they cannot prevent. This should induce us all to seek our rest in God, and to be willing to depart hence to a better world when he pleases: but we must not be weary of well-doing, or relinquish our work, till our Lord and Master release us: and at last no change can add to our present continued

PSALM LVI.

David prays for mercy, depending on the word of God, amidst the rage and malice of his enemies, 1—7. He comforts himself by thoughts of the Lord's providential care and gracious promises, and by praising him for past deliverances, 8—13.

To the chief Musician upon Jonathel-em-rechokim, * Michtam of David, when the Philistines took him in Gath.

BE merciful unto me, O God: for man would swallow me up; he fighting daily oppresseth me.

2 Mine enemies would daily swallow me up; for they be many that fight against me, O thou most High.

3 What time I am afraid, I will trust in thee.

4 In God I will praise his word; in God I have put my trust: I will not fear what flesh can do unto me.

5 Every day they wrest my words: all their thoughts are against me for evil.

6 They gather themselves together, they hide themselves, they mark my steps, when they wait for my soul.

7 Shall they escape by iniquity? in thine anger cast down the people, O God.

happiness, except that which augments our holiness. No wickedness so distresses the believer, as that which he witnesses in the visible church of God: with anguish of heart he often perceives violence and discord in the congregations, where the Gospel of peace is preached and professed; by which the common cause is weakened, the truth disgraced, and far more mischief done than by all the fury of persecutors. When professed Christians forsake God, and give in to malice, wickedness, and deceit; destruction and sorrow are at hand: disunion of heart, and intestine quarrels make way for further evils; and instead of a holy city, a Babel will be erected, which must also be destroyed. —The true Christian must expect trials from professed friends, from those whom he hath most trusted and served; and from those with whom he hath taken sweet counsel, and associated in the ordinances of God: this will be very painful, but by looking unto Jesus he will be enabled to bear it. Though we must not pray for the destruction of our most treacherous injurers; yet we may warn them of the doom of those who before them have trodden in the same path: and in every possible trial let us call upon the Lord, and he will save us. Our souls need spiritual nourishment at least as often as our bodies need food: but we generally starve in the midst of abundance; because we pray so seldom, so superficially, and so formally. David had more loyal subjects than he expected; Christ had more favourers than appeared, when the general cry was, "Crucify him, Crucify him:" and there are more true Christians, and believers have more real friends, than in their gloomy hours they suppose. If, however, God be for us, he will deliver our souls in peace from every conflict, whether few or many side with us: and it is better to have changes and afflictions, than to be hardened by uninterrupted prosperity, and thus emboldened to treachery and cruelty: which generally end in untimely death, and bring men down into the pit of destruction. Flatterers, whose words are soft and insinuating, are always to be suspected and dreaded: for many of this tribe have war in their hearts; and by smooth deceitful language do more harm, than they could have done with their drawn swords.

But let us learn to trust only in the Lord, and to cast every burden upon him, by faith and prayer: for he will never suffer the righteous to be moved, either for want of inward supports, or outward protection. And having thus found comfort ourselves, let us exhort and encourage our afflicted brethren to apply for the same relief.

NOTES.

PSALM LVI. Jonath-el-em-rechokim. This signifies, The silent dove in a far country. David had been harmless as a dove, in the midst of Saul's persecutions: he was silent and patient under oppression: he was now driven like a timorous dove to a distance from his home and from the ordinances of God: and when exposed to extreme danger from the Philistines, set on perhaps by the relations of Goliath, he bore all patiently, and attempted no revenge. In this he typified the harmless, suffering, and patient Jesus. (Notes, 1 Sam. xxi.)

V. 1, 2. Whilst David remained in the land of Judah, his countrymen fought against him: and at Gath the Philistines sought to slay him. Thus Jews and Gentiles united against Christ; and his disciples are "hated of all men" for his name's sake." The word rendered swallow me up, seems to mean, pursue me panting, with eagerness and rage; as Saul of Tarsus breathed out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples of Christ. The last clause may be rendered, "There be many that fight against me from on high," or, from a safe and fortified place.

V. 3, 4. "In the time of alarm," when others were dismayed and he was tempted to fear, the Psalmist determined to trust in God; and to honour his word, and glory in it, as full security in every possible danger. He especially referred to the promises of God, that he should be king over Israel.

V. 5. Wrest, &c. Or, "They thwart me in all my concerns." The words, in either sense of them, with the rest of this and the following verses, emphatically describe the conduct of the scribes and priests towards the Lord Jesus, of which the insidious perverseness and disingenuity, with which Saul and his courtiers treated David, were a sort of prefiguration.

13 For ^k thou hast delivered my soul from death: ^l wilt not thou deliver my feet from falling, that I may ^m walk before God in ⁿ the light of the living?

V. 8. Wanderings. In the translation used in the common Prayer Book, the word flittings is used. This is a provincial term for removing from one residence to another: but it is not generally understood. David was continually removing from place to place: but the Lord numbered all his wanderings, and watched over him wherever he went. And his tears were noticed, as if preserved in a bottle, or registered in a book; no doubt therefore his life would be precious in the sight of the Lord. ^a If God keep the tears of his saints, much more will he ^b remember their blood to avenge it; and though tyrants ^c burn their bones, yet can they not blot the tears and ^d blood out of God's register.

V. 12. Thy vows, &c. David had, it seems, made solemn vows, under his distresses, of rendering public praises unto God, when delivered; and of using his promised regal authority, to promote his glory: and he confidently expected, and fully purposed to perform these vows.

V. 13. The Lord had rescued David from many imminent perils of death; and he trusted that he would keep him from falling by the hands of his enemies; that he might live, to walk before him, as his anointed king, in prosperity and usefulness. Or, he meant that God, having saved his soul by converting grace, would uphold him in the ways of holiness, in which he desired to walk till he came to heaven.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The heavy and continued trials through which many of the Lord's servants have passed, should teach us to be silent and patient under our lighter afflictions. "We ^a have not yet resisted unto blood, striving against sin." Our good words may indeed be wrested to an evil meaning; and our footsteps watched by those who devise evil against us: but we are not in general endangered by furious assailants, who would swallow us up and destroy us; or, at least, they who would oppress us, have their hands bound or otherwise employed. Yet are we often tempted to repine and despond under our trivial sorrows! For this we should check and condemn ourselves; and under every disquieting fear, we should place our confidence in God, and pray more earnestly for his pardoning mercy. Meditation on the power of the Most High, engaged by his faithful promise for the protection of his people, will encourage us to say with boldness, "The Lord is my helper, I will not fear what man can do unto me." (Heb. xiii. 6.) The believer's soul, and body, and character, and interest, are all safe under the divine protection; and when he prays earnestly, his enemies will be driven back and disappointed. Men may for a time prosper in and by iniquity; but God in his anger will soon cast them down: and our only security lies in escaping from iniquity. The Lord graciously notes and orders the removals of his people: whilst they keep in the path of duty, they cannot be driven from his gracious presence; and their tears of godly sorrow, and those which are extorted by persecution, will be reserved to be jewels in their crown of glory. Let us then be careful to discharge our own obligations. General vows are upon us as Christians, which have been ratified at baptism and the Lord's supper; and we have made promises and engagements in seasons of trouble and distress. Let us be careful to perform them, when delivered, and then we may leave all the rest with the Lord: and if his grace have delivered our souls from the death of sin; he will deliver our feet from falling, and bring us to heaven, to walk before him for ever in the light of the living.

NOTES.

PSALM LVII. Al-taschith, or Thou wilt not destroy. Destroy not. This may intimate, that David trusted that the Lord would not permit him to be destroyed, though closely pursued by Saul. Some think the word refers to the restriction David laid on his officers, not to destroy Saul. (Notes, 1 Sam. xxiv.)

richly and advancement: he would not seek them by killing Saul, nor would he allow his soldiers to slay him: but he trusted in God, who had given him the promise of the kingdom, to perform all things necessary to its fulfilment in his own time and manner.

V. 3. From the, Or, "To the reproof of him, that would swallow me up."—God would sooner send his angels from heaven to deliver his servant, than suffer his furious enemies to destroy him.

V. 4. My soul, &c. The fiercest of beasts, the most devouring of elements, and the sharpest of military weapons, are selected to represent the power and fury of David's enemies: how much more furious were the enemies of Christ, who, in his passion, resembled Daniel in the lion's den, and the three children in the fiery furnace? (Horne.)

V. 5. Be thou, &c. If David had been run down, God would have been dishonoured: but his marvellous deliverance and advancement were honourable to the name of the Lord; and even angels in heaven, as well as men on earth, would glorify him on that account. In this he was peculiarly a type of the Saviour.

V. 7—11. The Psalmist here suddenly changes his language from deep complaints to exulting praises. His heart, delivered from desponding fears, was fixed in a determination to praise God, and to employ his tongue and all his musical powers in that service: with this he would awaken the morning, or begin the day; and he would render his worship public, that both the Jews and the surrounding nations might hear. This may with peculiar propriety be applied to Jesus, as risen from the dead, and exulting in the view of the glory of God, in the conversion of the Gentiles.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Protection from man's injustice must be sought from the Lord's mercy; and the most eminent believers need frequently to reiterate the publican's prayer, "God be merciful to me, a sinner." But an inward consciousness that our souls trust in the Lord, may enable us in the most imminent dangers, to expect, that our calamities will at length be overpast: and, in the mean time, by faith and prayer, we must make the shadow of his almighty wings our refuge; (Note, Ruth ii. 12.) If we have fled from the wrath to come unto Jesus Christ, we are interested in all his merits, grace, and victories; and in all the precious promises and glorious perfections of our God: and he, that hath performed all things requisite to the salvation of his people, will in answer to our prayers perform all things for us and in us, which are needful to our enjoyment of it. It is true that the sons of men, among whom we live, are often savage as lions, and fierce as the flaming fire: their teeth seem to be spears and arrows, and their slanderous tongues sharp swords: and Satan, a still more subtle, powerful, and cruel enemy, would swallow us up. But notwithstanding their snares and pits, their stratagems and assaults, we are safe, if we belong to the Lord. The Redeemer was far more exposed to their rage and malice, and by their wicked hands was crucified and slain: yet the Lord sent from heaven and raised him from the dead, and advanced him to his glorious throne: and he will, through him, send forth his mercy and truth, and, graciously accomplishing his promises, will rescue our souls from all tempters and persecutors; and angels shall join with men in beholding and celebrating his glory in our salvation. Let us then seek to have our hearts fixed on him, and prepared for his spiritual worship; to celebrate the praises of his boundless mercy and unfailing faithfulness, and to "glorify him with body and spirit, which are his." Let us assuredly expect and wait for, the completion of what concerneth us: and let us earnestly pray, that the Lord would be exalted above the heavens, and his glory above all the earth, by extending the blessings of his Gospel through every part of every land.

NOTES.

PSALM LVIII. V. 1, 2. It is conjectured that Saul instituted a legal process against David; and, by corrupting the assembly of the elders, obtained an iniquitous sentence of treason against him, in order to cover his malicious persecution. Thus the Sanhedrim, and the people of the Jews, and Pilate, condemned Jesus to be put to death. In both cases, the persons concerned inwardly designed and loved wickedness; and whilst they pretended to weigh the cause in the balance of justice, they used their power to commit violence, after having deliberately considered the nature and consequences of their conduct: and this was the more heinous, as it was perpetrated by the magistrates placed over the people of God, in the land where his name was worshipped and his oracles made known.

V. 3—5. The Psalmist here traced back the base conduct of his persecutors, (as he did his own crimes, Marg. Ref.) to the source of original depravity; which had neither been counteracted by proper discipline, nor subdued by regenerating grace.—All wickedness springs from the alienation of the heart from God: and children very soon manifest evil tempers, and contract early habits of lying and of other vices. If therefore they grow up without change or restraint, and escape with impunity, or are even encouraged in wickedness, (as Saul's courtiers and judges were;) they will at length be hardened in sin, and ready to perpetrate any villany. The most hateful dispositions are found as natural to them and as fatal to others, as the poison of a serpent. It was indeed commonly allowed, that some kind of music, or skilful incantations, would disarm the rage of serpents in general: yet one species of adder seemed to be deaf, or as if she stopped her ears against the most skilful strains of those who attempted to charm her; so no arguments, persuasions, or services of David, could mollify the envenomed malice of Saul and his party against him.—In like manner the heavenly discourses and the beneficent miracles of Jesus did not prevail to disarm the rage of that generation of vipers against him: and sinners still stop their ears, and close their hearts against conviction or persuasion, whilst they rush forward in rebellion and enmity against God and his cause.

V. 6—9. David's enemies were strong and savage as young lions: he therefore prayed that their teeth might be broken to prevent mischief. They overwhelmed him like an inundation: but he desired it might prove like a land flood, which is soon wasted. They were about to shoot him: but he would have their bows, or their arrows, to be shivered to pieces, and become like straw, and do no execution: and he prayed that they might waste insensibly as the snail, which leaves its substance all along its track; and that they might come to nothing, like an abortion. He also predicted, that their prosperous rage, (which resembled the crackling of thorns under a pot,) would soon be extinct, and produce no effect: whilst the Lord in his wrath would hurry them into speedy destruction; as a furious whirlwind drives a living man down a precipice, or into a dreadful pit. This seems the meaning of the passage: but the original is to us peculiarly difficult.

V. 10, 11. David's cause was that of true religion; and though he would not avenge himself, he knew that the Lord would, and with terrible displays of his power and wrath. Then the righteous would rejoice, not in the misery of Saul and his party, but in the display of the divine glory, and in the triumphs of truth and piety over ungodliness and iniquity: nay, the most terrible circumstances of their ruin would add to the comfort and purity of the righteous; as if a man should take pleasure in washing his feet in the blood of those who had trampled upon every thing sacred: whilst all who witnessed these events would be constrained to confess, that "Verily there is a reward, or fruit, for the righteous, verily he is a God that judgeth in the earth."—All this was most signally verified in the destruction of Jerusalem, after the Jews had crucified their Messiah: and it hath had, and will have, repeated accomplishments, in the establishment of true Christianity upon the ruins of its opposers: but the day of judgment will be its grand and final accomplishment.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Injustice established by law and decreed by judges, is more malignant than any other. It is grievous to behold the sons of men preying upon their own species: but more so to see the congregation of those who profess to be the children of God, combining against the remnant of his true people. We may very properly appeal to the consciences of such iniquitous judges, whether indeed they speak righteously and decide uprightly? But the malice, avarice, or pride of their hearts, prevails against their convictions; and their iniquity is intentional, deliberate, and determined. Whilst we behold the effects of natural depravity in the horrid crimes of others, we should be humbled by recollecting that the principles of them all are in our hearts also. We ought therefore to be thankful to the Lord for merciful restraints; earnest in seeking renewing grace; watchful over ourselves, and patient under the effects of our fallen nature in others. We may see in our children the wickedness of the world in embryo: their dislike to religion, their ingenuity at inventing lies, their pride, vanity, envy, and anger, are rank weeds, which if neglected, will overspread their minds, and prevent the growth of every good thing. It is our duty therefore to bestow pains upon their education; and above all to pray for converting grace to make them new creatures. But, though the poison of a serpent be within us; we may prevent in great measure its breaking forth to the injury of others. When the Saviour's instructions, reasonings, and persuasions are duly regarded; the very serpent becomes harmless and gentle like the dove. But they who refuse to hear him that speaketh to them in strains of heavenly wisdom, must perish miserably and eternally; nor can all nature furnish images, to represent their dreadful doom. Though the righteous are not glad at calamities: yet they must rejoice to see the cause of God triumphant, and men on every side convinced that there is a reward for the righteous and a God who judgeth in the earth. They must therefore exult on some occasions, in the ruin of terrible persecutors: they will in due time rejoice at the destruction of all antichristian corrupters of the faith; and at last they will witness the perdition of ungodly men with unmingled joy, and sing, "So let all thine enemies perish, O LORD."

NOTES.

PSALM LIX. Title. (Notes, 1 Sam. xix. 11—13.) 'In this psalm David expresses what his thoughts and affections were, when Saul sent officers to watch his house all night, and to slay him when he came out of his door in 'the morning.' (Bp. Patrick.) His triumphant confidence in God in this extreme danger, and his anticipated fervour of gratitude for the deliverance which he fully expected, show a peculiarly pious and happy state of mind in such trying circumstances.

V. 1. Defend, or, "Thou shalt set me on high," &c. The clause is future, and implies the strongest assurance of safety, and advancement above all enemies, grounded on the special promises of God.

V. 3. Not for, &c. David had not in any thing offended Saul, but was persecuted by him and his adherents, for his good deeds, not for his sins: and in this he typified the suffering, but perfectly holy Jesus.

V. 5. Be not, &c. The Lord's mercy and patience towards the inveterate enemies of his cause, might appear to David ruinous to the interests of true religion in Israel: but the words are rather a prediction of that judgment without mercy, which will be executed upon all the implacable opposers of Christ and his people; as they may literally be rendered, "Thou wilt not be merciful to any 'perfidious workers of iniquity.'" They who repent, cease to be "wicked transgressors" or "perfidious workers of iniquity;" and none of the impenitent find mercy.

V. 6. They return. David's persecutors remitted their pursuit of his life during the day time: but in the evening they returned to hunt their prey, with menaces and reproaches, as the hound gives mouth when upon the scent after the hunted animal: thus they compassed the city to prevent his escape. The scribes and pharisees also chose

⁶ Prov. xv. 2. ⁷ Behold, ^o they belch out with their mouth; ^p swords are in their lips: for ^q who, say they, doth hear?

⁸ But, ^r thou, O LORD, shalt laugh at them; thou shalt have all ^s the heathen in derision.

⁹ Because of ^t his strength will I wait upon thee: for God is my ^{*} defence.

¹⁰ ^u The God of my mercy shall ^v prevent me: God shall ^w let me see my desire upon mine [†] enemies.

¹¹ ^x Slay them not, lest my people forget: ^y scatter them by thy power; and bring them down, O LORD, ^z our shield.

¹³ ^d Consume them in wrath, consume them, that they may not be: and ^e let them know that God ruleth in Jacob unto the ends of the earth. Selah.

¹⁵ Let them ^g wander up and down ^h for meat, and ⁱ grudge ^j if they be not satisfied.

¹⁶ But ^k I will sing of thy power; yea, I will ^l sing aloud of thy mercy ^m in the morning: ⁿ for thou hast been my Defence and Refuge ^o in the day of my trouble.

¹⁷ Unto thee, ^p O my Strength, will I sing: ^q for God is my Defence, and the God of my mercy.

the night for the season of their machinations against the Son of David.

V. 7. Swords, &c. The reviling menaces and proud boastings, which were vented from the furious malice of these persecutors, wounded David's peace and reputation like swords, and subserved their designs of murdering him: nor would they have dared to utter such notorious falsehoods, if they had not disbelieved the being of a God, or their accountableness to him.

V. 8. (Note ii. 4.) In this psalm (5) and in other places the Israelites who set themselves against the man after God's own heart, are called the heathen: and in like manner the Jews, when they had crucified the Son of David, and persisted in refusing to submit to him, were excluded from the church of God, and have ever since been treated as a part of the Gentile world; except as marked with more striking indications of the divine displeasure.

V. 9. 'The more strong and the more malicious Saul is, the more will I look unto thee;—for thou, O God, art my sure refuge in my greatest distresses.' (Bp. Hall.) Many, however, suppose the Psalmist to refer to the almighty power of God, as the ground of his cheerful confidence.

V. 10. God, who had always shown mercy and loving kindness to his servant, would certainly come to his aid in this emergency, in some way beyond all human expectation; so that when he seemed to stand afar off, he would show himself present, to prevent his enemies from hurting him. He would also exceed the hope of his friends, and seem to answer his prayers before they were finished.—Thus David would be enabled to look on his enemies without dismay, and behold their disappointment. Nothing is said, either in this or other similar passages, of David's desiring the destruction of his foes; and his conduct, when he heard of Saul's death, implies, that he had not desired, though he had foreseen the woful day. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11—13. The rejection of the Jewish nation, their long continued dispersion, and their preservation as a distinct people, every where reminding men of God's vengeance on those who reject his gospel, and proudly despise and blaspheme his Son; (whilst every successive generation allows the deeds of their fathers by their enmity against Christianity,) form such a striking accomplishment of these verses, that we must conclude the Holy Spirit intended these events in them: though it is probable that David meant the disgrace, degradation, and gradual extirpation of Saul's family, for their opposition to the Lord's Anointed, and all their imprecations and calumnies against him.

V. 14, 15. These verses may mean, that the punishment of David's persecutors would be answerable to their crimes: their clamours against him would be followed by howlings of distress, like those of the dog that is starving with hunger: they would in vain compass the city to find food, and would grudge all that went beside them. The extreme famine in Jerusalem, when besieged by the Romans, and the state of the Jewish nation ever since, as destitute of the bread of life, might be alluded to. But some think that David here again describes the conduct of his enemies, as foretelling and rejoicing in their disappointment: and that having repeated what he had said before, adds what should be translated, "They wander up and down to devour me: and if they be not satisfied, they tarry all night." The words are throughout in the future tense, and may properly be thus rendered. In the old translation, the last clause is, "Surely they shall not be satisfied, though they tarry all night."

V. 16. In the morning. David was confident that in the morning, when his enemies expected to devour him, he should in perfect safety be singing the praises of God.

To the chief Musician upon ^a Shushaneduth, * Michtam of David, to teach; ^b when he strove with Aram-naharaim, and with Aram-zobah, when Joab re-

We should indeed greatly fear suffering as “evil-doers, or as busy-bodies in other men’s matters:” but not be either afraid or ashamed of the hatred of the workers of iniquity, when “they prepare themselves, and are gathered together against us, without our fault.” They may be both mighty and bloody; their words may be as swords, and their actions may correspond with them: but the Lord will awake, and behold, and hasten to the help of his servants. In vain did Saul and his mighty men seek the life of David: they could not prevent his advancement to the throne, but they occasioned their own ignominy and ruin. Nor could the rulers of the Jews, by crucifying Jesus, prevent his glorification; but they thus hastened their own destruction: and neither tempters nor persecutors can succeed any better, in lying in wait for the soul of the believer. The serpent and his seed bruised the heel of the Redeemer, but He will crush their head: because of the Lord’s strength, his servants may then confidently wait on him: and if we trust in him as the God of our mercy, and have recourse to him in every temptation and tribulation, he will assuredly be our Defence against all those that rise up against us. In proportion as we are conscious, that we are not wicked transgressors that continue impenitent in known sin, we may be satisfied that our cause is of God. The predictions that we read, concerning the vengeance to be executed on all the implacable enemies of Christ and his kingdom, and upon all the impenitent and unbelieving; and the accomplishment of many of them in this present world, should impress our minds with an awe of the divine Majesty and purity, and a dread of all iniquity. The destruction of Jerusalem, and the state of the Jewish nation for much above seventeen hundred years, when viewed in connexion with that awful imprecation upon themselves and their children, which accompanied their malice and lying testimony against Christ, and their cry, “Crucify him, crucify him,” should make us tremble at the thought of lies and imprecations, which are the offspring of pride and hatred; and still more, lest we should at last be found despisers or abusers of his Gospel. But we should also pray for the conversion of that people, that they may at length know that Jesus is the Lord and God, and that he ruleth in Jacob, and unto the ends of the earth. Our prayers, however, for our personal enemies and the opposers of our holy faith, should be attended with solemn warnings: for there will no mercy be shown to obstinate and impenitent transgressors; but they will be eternal monuments of the Lord’s abhorrence of sin, whilst his wrath will be unto them as a devouring, yet unquenchable, fire. NOTES.

PSALM LX. Title. Shushan-eduth seems to mean, a psalm of testimony set to an instrument of six strings. The psalm was intended to testify and teach the danger of opposing the servants of God, and the happiness of uniting with them. Aram-Naharaim, or Syria of the rivers, that is, between the Tygris and the Euphrates, denotes Mesopotamia: and Aram-zobah, Syria to the west of the Euphrates. (Note, 2 Sam. viii. 13, 14.)

V. 1—3. When Saul and his sons were slain, the Philistines triumphed, and the Israelites were scattered and dismayed. The setting up of Ishbosheth over the ten tribes, and the consequent divisions and civil war, made the land to tremble, broke its force, and exposed it to the common enemy. Thus the people of God, for their sins, were showed hard things, and made to drink the wine of astonishment, as if they had been his enemies. For the wound made by a skilful surgeon may be as painful as that made by a mortal foe: though it be given with a contrary intention, and to save life instead of destroying it. When the Israelites supported Saul, whom God had rejected, and who was evidently given up to the most furious passions, and to adopt the most ruinous measures; when to please him they concurred in persecuting David, the Lord’s anointed, whose wisdom and courage, as well as exemplary piety, loyalty, and patriotism, entitled him to their highest esteem and confidence; and when after Saul’s death they, at Abner’s instance, adhered to Ishbosheth, and carried on war against David in direct opposition to the known will of God: they seemed to be perfectly infatuated, as if they had drunk some intoxicating poison, which had bereaved them of their senses, and so filled them with terror and amazement, that they knew not what they did.

V. 4. David, as anointed of God and advanced to the throne, was a banner given to the pious remnant of Israel: and it was displayed, that they might resort to it, and under his authority and command expect the performance of the Lord's faithful promises, and the triumphing of his truth. In this he was a Type of Christ, and his kingdom and salvation.

V. 5. David was beloved of God, and a type of his "beloved Son, in whom he is well pleased:" but the words in the original are plural, and evidently relate to Israel, as the Lord's chosen and beloved people; (Marg. Ref.) and the verse contains the intercession of David for his subjects; who prefigured in this our heavenly Advocate, that never fails to plead in behalf of all, however heretofore rebellious, who bow to the sceptre of his grace and come to God by him.

V. 6-12. God had promised to David the throne over all Israel; and to Israel the dominion over the adjacent countries. The promises were in part fulfilled, as they related to David. Shechem, Succoth, Gilead, and Manasseh, were in his possession. These had been subject to Ishbosheth; who had also been supported by Ephraim, that powerful tribe; which was now become the guardian of David's government and person: the legislative authority was transferred to the tribe of Judah, where it would continue till the coming of the Messiah: and whilst Israel, being willingly subject to David's equitable government, shared its blessings, the neighbouring nations were about to be forced into submission. Moab would soon be reduced to bondage, and employed in the lowest menial services. David also fully expected in a short time to vanquish Edom, and take possession of it, by casting his shoe over it; or even tread it under foot and crush its strength; as it had been predicted: (Marg. Ref.) and let Philistia now triumph over Israel as in times past, if it could. These conquests however were not completed. Bozrah of Edom, or some other strong city, (perhaps Rabbah of the Ammonites,) yet remained unsubdued: but David would not rely on his own valour and conduct, nor on those of his captains or allies, for completing his conquests; but on the Lord, who had cast off his people, but was now returned to them, and fought for them: and their enemies would soon perceive the difference between the armies of David, which JEHOVAH accompanied to the battle, and those of Saul when JEHOVAH had doomed him to destruction.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The anger of God against sin is the sole cause of all misery, personal or public, in families, churches, and nations, that hath been, is, or shall be endured, in time or to eternity. Professing churches are often cast off, and deprived of their privileges for their sins; nations tremble, and are broken for the same cause; yea, the earth and creation itself, groan under the load of man's guilt. Even the true believer, when he commits iniquity, will sometimes be showed heavy things, and made to drink of the wine of astonishment, till anguish and dismay for a time seize upon him. In all these cases, there is no remedy, but by returning to the Lord with repentance, faith, and prayer; and beseeching him to return to us, and heal the breaches that sin hath made. Blessed be his name, he hath given a banner, in the cross of Christ, to those that fear his name: that resorting thither, and receiving mercy, they may enlist under him who now fills the mediatorial throne, and so wage successful war against the enemies of their souls. Oh may this banner be every where displayed, that all nations may embrace the truth, and experience the faithfulness of God to his promises. He who exalted the Saviour by his own right hand to the throne of glory, will hear his intercession for all who pray in his name, and are beloved for his sake; and save them also by his almighty power. The man, who is in Christ a new creature, may rejoice in all the precious promises, which God hath spoken in his holiness, and by his Holy One; and may consider the whole purchased inheritance as his own in reversion: and the present privileges to which he is called, and the sanctifying and comforting influences of the Spirit which he experiences, are the sure earnest of heavenly glory. If Christ be ours, all things are ours; mercy, grace, peace, wisdom, righteousness, strength, and victory; life and death, angels and men, earth and heaven are ours; and all things shall, in one way or other, subserve our eternal good. We are not yet, however, made complete conquerors: and no true believer will abuse these truths, to the allowed indulgence of sloth or vain confidence.

Trusting in God to arm us for the conflict, to lead us forth and support us, and to give us strength in every time of trouble, we may do valiantly and tread down all our enemies, and we shall ere long obtain the conqueror's crown. The church also, over which oppressors have so often insulted, as if the Lord had cast her off, shall speedily triumph over them all: and whilst they, who willingly submit to our anointed King, shall share his glories, all his foes shall be put under his feet.

NOTES.

PSALM LXI. V. 2. This psalm seems to have been composed, when David was driven by Absalom's rebellion, like an exile beyond Jordan, to the extremities of the land, and far from the sanctuary of God. His heart was overwhelmed with complicated distresses, as by an inundation. The divine mercy, support, and protection, formed the Rock on which he desired to rest his soul, out of the reach of the tempestuous waves that dashed and raged below: but he was like the ship-wrecked mariner, who is exposed to the raging billows, from which he would be secured, if he could reach the summit of a rock that is close to him: but it is far too high for him to climb it without help. Thus David found, that he could not by faith and hope ascend, and be established on, the Rock of salvation, unless the Lord led him to it and helped him to get upon it.

V. 3. 'Nothing doth more strengthen our faith, than the remembrance of God's succour in times past.'

V. 4, 5. The Psalmist, though now driven away from the courts of God, rested assured that he should be restored again to them, and perpetually enjoy the comfort and benefit of public ordinances: but he seems also to have looked through the shadow of the earthly sanctuary, to "the holy place not made with hands," and to have exulted in hope of the eternal felicity of heaven; as now abiding under the covert of the Almighty, and being "kept by his power through faith unto salvation." For it can hardly be supposed, that he meant his temporal authority, by the "heritage of those that fear the name of God;"

3 For thou hast been a Shelter for me, and a ° strong Tower from the enemy.

4 ° I will abide in thy tabernacle for ever: ° I will * trust in the covert of thy wings. Selah.

6 Thou † wilt prolong the king's life: and his years as † many generations.

7 He shall ° abide before God for ever: O ° prepare mercy and truth, which may preserve him.

which had been given him, in answer to his earnest prayers and solemn vows.

V. 6, 7. David might here mean himself as king of Israel: though apparently deposed; he trusted that he should yet live, and reign over the people of God, for some time to come; and his kingdom would be continued to him in his posterity to future generations, according as God had mercifully promised, and would faithfully perform.—But the King Messiah, as descending from him, who was to reign for ever over the house of Israel, and by whom the mercy and truth prepared for sinful men was to be conferred, seems to have been especially intended. Whatever became of David's personal interests, he rejoiced in the prospect of the Messiah's kingdom; and prayed for the faithful performance of God's gracious promises, which form the stability of his mediatorial throne. The Chaldee paraphrase of the sixth verse is very remarkable, 'Thou shalt add days to the days of King Messias; his years shall be as the generation of this world, and of the world to come.' (Horne.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When removed from other comforts, we should more earnestly seek consolation from God: and when cares, fears, sorrows, or temptations, like a wild deluge, overwhelm our hearts, our cries unto him should be more fervent than ever. No outward situation can exclude us from communion with God through Jesus Christ; but without divine assistance, we can neither climb, nor take shelter in, that Rock of salvation: when therefore we perceive that there is safety in him and none in ourselves, we should pray fervently for the Holy Spirit of promise, that we may by his gracious teaching and assistance, "believe to the saving of our souls." As genuine experience is acquired, encouragement will abound: for we shall more readily trust in the covert of his wings, when he hath been heretofore a Shelter for us, and a strong Tower from our enemies. When we have the opportunity we should keep close to the ordinances of God; and we should remember, that he hears our vows, and witnesses our pious desires, intentions, and engagements; and therefore we should daily perform them. If he have given us the goodly heritage of those that fear his name, we shall have enough: our anointed King is alive for evermore; and all his true subjects shall live by him, and with him, and thus abide before God for ever. NOTES.

PSALM LXII. Title. Jeduthun was first chosen to be one of the chief musicians, when the ark was removed to mount Zion: and, as this psalm is inccribed to him, some have thought, that it relates to Absalom's rebellion, and not to the persecution which David endured from Saul. But as several other psalms, which certainly were composed before David came to the throne, are inscribed to the chief musician; we must suppose, that when the Psalmody at the sanctuary was appointed, David delivered to the chief musicians the psalms which he had previously written, as well as those which he afterwards from time to time composed. Internal evidence does not clearly show to which season of distress the Psalmist referred; as his language seems equally suited to either of them. 'There are no petitions at all in this psalm; nor any thanksgivings: but only expressions of faith and confidence in God.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 1, 2. The word rendered waiteth, signifies silence. "Yet my soul keepeth silence unto God." "Though Satan tempted him to murmur against God, yet he bridled his affections, and resting upon God's promise, he bore his cross patiently, and overcame all temptations." David was conscious, that in calm submission and well-grounded confidence, he sought and expected protection and deliverance from God. He therefore steadily adhered to the line of duty; believing it "good both to hope, and quietly to wait for the salvation of the Lord." And he rested assured, that though his enemies might for a while give him some disturbance, yet he should not be greatly moved, or materially injured, either in his temporal or spiritual concerns.

V. 3, 4. The Psalmist, having avowed his confidence in God, expostulates with his enemies, warns them of their danger, and exposes their wickedness. Saul and his party, envious of David's reputation, incessantly plotted against his life, and to exclude him from the royal dignity, to which God had appointed him; and they greatly desired to see him disgraced by some evident misconduct. They delighted in lies, both when they falsely accused him, and when they deceitfully spoke friendly to him: but by this they only brought ruin upon themselves; like a wall, which first bulges out and totters, and then falls down at once.—In like manner, Absalom, Ahithophel, and the other conspirators, artfully formed their measures for driving, with disgrace, their aged monarch from that honourable station to which God had raised him; and they covered their treachery and malice with fair pretences: but they only brought on themselves swift and dreadful destruction.—The opposition of the Jews and other enemies to Christ and his cause, springs from similar motives, is conducted in the same manner, and has had, or will have, the same event.

V. 5—7. The Septuagint renders the fifth verse, "Nevertheless my soul submit to God, for my patience is from him:" and no doubt quiet submission to God, as well as a single expectation of deliverance, happiness, and honour from him alone, in his own time and manner, was meant.—The repetitions, with some variation, of these verses, are peculiarly animated: and the Psalmist, by thus dwelling on the ground of his encouragement, baffled his temptations and found his faith and hope invigorated.

V. 8—10. The Psalmist having risen above the disquietude with which he had been assaulted, next gives counsel and caution to the people in general, (as he had before warned his persecutors :) He exhorts them to trust in God at all times, whatever their outward circumstances or inward conflicts might be: and by fervent prayer to pour out their hearts before him, (Marg. Ref.) and they would find him a secure refuge in every danger.—But as for men, no confidence could reasonably be placed either on the fickle multitude, who might be induced to murder one day the very persons whom they idolized the day before; or on the great, who generally made promises which they never performed, and raised expectations which they never answered: so that even vanity itself seemed heavier in the balance than all of them together. Yet to trust in oppression or injustice would be still more foolish and wicked. ‘Be not so vain as to trust to ill-gotten goods: for if your riches increase by honest means, they are not things, wherein to place either your confidence and hope, or your love and joy.’ (Bp. Patrick.) ‘Indeed he who is made vain and covetous by money, however honestly gotten, renders that a curse to one, which was designed a blessing to many, and drowns himself in the spring, which should have watered all around him.’ (Horne.)—The old translation of this last verse, seems more literal than the present version. “Trust not in oppression, nor in robbery: Be not vain: if riches increase, set not your heart upon them.”

V. 11, 12. God had solemnly declared, as it were once for all, and the Psalmist had repeatedly heard it, or “had heard these two things,” that power and mercy belong to God. ‘So that the wicked shall feel thy power, and the godly thy mercy.’—The Lord can punish and destroy, he can save and bless, as he pleases: all created power is from him and bounded by him; and no creature can do more harm or good than He pleases. Mercy also belongeth to him: and his recompensing the defiled imperfect services of believing sinners, and blotting out all their transgressions for the Redeemer’s sake; and so punishing none but the unbelieving and impenitent, is a full proof of his abundant mercy, and an encouragement to trust in him.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The lively believer, conscious of sincerity, can without hesitation avow, “Truly my soul waiteth upon God.” From the Lord, “his Defence, and Salvation,” he expects presentsafety and eternal felicity, he considers all creatures as instruments in His hands; and he waits for promised blessings in the path of duty, and in the use of appointed or allowed means. Yet, however blamelessly he conducts himself, he must expect a measure of the same enmity with which the world treated his Saviour; when every device was framed, every deceit used, and every slander propagated, to cast him down from his excellency. But the doom of David’s persecutors, and of the crucifiers of Christ, may be expected by all who would tempt his people to sin, or vilify their characters: and none will be punished more severely, than they who deceive men with fair words and smooth speeches; who “delight in lies,” who “bless with their mouth, but curse inwardly.” Let us, however, having fairly warned and expostulated with such infatuated persons, wait only upon God, and expect all our happiness from him: then shall we not greatly be moved, either to anger, to pride, or to despondency, by the malice or flattery of the ungodly: Nay, when our faith grows strong, we shall be confident of not being moved at all to our real hurt: and meditation and prayer are blessed means of invigorating faith and hope.—When we are rendered joyful and bold in reliance on God under peculiar trials, we have a vast advantage in exhorting our brethren to similar confidence. We may and ought to “trust in him at all times,” in persecution, temptation, affliction, and at the approach of death for this is our privilege, and honourable to God, and it will lead us to “pour out our hearts before him;” laying open all our fears, sorrows, and wants, as to our bosom Friend, (Note, 1 Sam. i. 15;) and making him our Refuge from every danger and foe; and we shall renounce other confidences, that we may singly depend on him. They who refuse to do this, will find at length that their dependence on men, whether on the many or the great, will terminate in disappointment and shame: and we be to them who trust in iniquity and oppression; who accumulate wealth by evading good laws, or oppressing under the colour of bad ones, or setting all law and justice at defiance; while the miseries of multitudes ripen individuals for the vengeance of heaven. Indeed reliance on increasing riches, however obtained, is idolatry, and totally inconsistent with the life of faith.—Yet the idea of increasing wealth is associated with that of augmented felicity in almost every human heart; and it is extremely difficult to possess riches without trusting in them and setting the heart upon them. The true and consistent believer, however, receives all from God; and uses it to his glory as a steward who must render an account. These things God hath spoken, and we have heard: may we not forget that power belongeth only to him; may we trust in his mercy and grace: and abound in his work, expecting a gracious recompense from him alone!

PSALM LXIII.

David earnestly thirsts for God, and to behold his glory at the sanctuary, 1, 2. Regarding the love of God more than life, he determines to rejoice in praising him, 3—5. By meditation and prayer he rises to full assurance of protection, success, and exulting joy in God; and predicts the ruin of his enemies, 6—11.

A Psalm of David, ^a when he was in the wilderness of Judah.

O GOD, ^b thou art my God; ^c early will I seek thee: ^d my soul thirsteth for thee, ^e my flesh longeth for thee in a ^f dry and thirsty land where no water is;

NOTES.

PSALM LXIII. Title. It is generally supposed that David composed this most fervent and devout psalm, when pursued by Saul in the deserts of Judah. (Marg. Ref.) Some, however, think that it was written at a later period; namely, when he fled from Absalom, and before he passed over Jordan.

V. 1—4. The Psalmist, banished from the courts and ordinances of God, considered himself as a weary traveller, in a desolate and half parched land, when ready to perish by thirst. And his earnest desire after communion with God and his worshippers at the sanctuary, seems to have affected his body as well as his soul; perhaps spoiling his rest and appetite, and impairing his health and vigour.—He resolved, however, having chosen the Lord for his God, to seek him early, diligently, and with decided preference.—‘Thus the true Christian dedicates to God the sweet hour of prime. He opens the eyes of his understanding with those of his body, and awakes each morning to righteousness. He arises with an inextinguishable thirst after those comforts which the world cannot give; and has immediate recourse, by prayer, to the Fountain of the water of life, ever longing to behold the divine power and glory in the sanctuary above, of which he has been favoured with a glimpse, in the services of the church below.’ (Horne.)—Many explain the words, “To see thy power and glory,” &c. of the ark, which was the symbol of the Lord’s powerful, glorious, and gracious presence with his people. But the ark itself was concealed from sight: nor does it appear that, in the days of David, there was in general any external display of the divine glory at the sanctuary. It may therefore be supposed, that he referred to the internal and spiritual views which, under the influence of the Holy Spirit, he had experienced of the perfections and glory of God, while attending on those ordinances, which both commemorated the wonderful works of the Lord for his people, and typified the salvation of the promised Redeemer. These con-templations and discoveries, had often excited his admiring and adoring love and gratitude, and animated his confidence and joy in God; which made him regret exceedingly the loss of such pleasant and profitable opportunities. This enjoyment of the love of God, as an anticipation of heavenly felicity, he valued more than life itself; and therefore he was fully determined to employ himself and his powers of body and soul in praising the Lord, as long as he lived, and wherever he was driven; confidently expecting that the sweet experience which he recollected, would thus be renewed to him; even if banished from the outward means of grace.

V. 5, 6. ‘The remembrance of thy favour is more sweet to me than all the pleasures and dainties of the world.’ The Psalmist waited for the pleasure of communion with God, with more ardent desire than any epicure ever anticipated the enjoyment of sensual pleasure; and the remembrance of God during the night cheered his soul when dangers or cares disturbed his rest. Can any candid man read this psalm, and then speak of true devotion as merely a dispassionate intellectual exercise of the understanding, without any warm emotions or vehement affections of the heart? Weighed in the balance of such phlegmatic Christians, the man after God’s own heart must be numbered among enthusiasts: for though his devotion was most rational, it certainly was most fervent and enraptured; and in fact the more rational on that very account.

V. 7, 8. The remembrance of past protection and deliverance, encouraged David not only to rely on the power, truth, and love of God, in his extremest dangers; but to rejoice in this confidence under his sharpest afflictions. His soul cleaved unto God, as the child clings about its kind parent, when alarmed or in pain; and followed hard after him, earnestly seeking nearer communion and conformity; being upheld by the power of divine grace in thus pressing forward in his heavenly course.—The fervour of David’s devotion, whether pouring out his soul in earnest prayer, with vigorous exercises of faith and hope; or celebrating the praises of God with admiring love, joyful gratitude, and glowing zeal for his honour and glory, seem especially to have procured him the honourable distinction of "the man after God's own heart." —The following verses from Dr. Watts, well support the animation of the leading parts of this exquisitely beautiful psalm.

With heart, and eyes, and lifted hands,
 For thee I long, to thee I look ;
 As travellers, in thirsty lands
 Pant for the cooling water-brook.

With early feet I love t'appear
 Among thy saints, and seek thy face ;
 •ft have I seen thy glory there,
 And felt the power of sovereign grace.

Nor fruits nor wines that tempt our taste,
 Nor all the joys our senses know,
 Could make me so divinely blest,
 Or raise my cheerful passions so.

My life itself without thy love,
 No taste of pleasure could afford,
 'Twould but a tiresome burden prove,
 If I were banish'd from the Lord.

Amidst the wakeful hours of night,
 When busy cares afflict my head,
 One thought of thee gives new delight,
 And adds refreshment to my bed.

I'll lift my hands, I'll raise my voice,
 While I have breath to pray or praise ;
 This work shall make my heart rejoice,
 And spend the remnant of my days.

V. 9—11. The Psalmist, while employed in these devout exercises, clearly foresaw the disgraceful end of his persecutors. They would perish, as if swallowed up by the earth, with Dathan and Abiram : or falling by the sword, they would be left unburied, for food to the foxes, with which the land abounded. This was, probably, the case with many that fell at Gilboa. He also foresaw himself, as advanced upon the throne, to be the king of Israel ; and as rejoicing in God, and not in his outward dignity, or in the ruin of his enemies : whilst every one, who cordially swore allegiance to him, or who, as worshippers of God, swore with solemnity by his name, would glory in the advancement of his servant ; and all who falsely accused, or attempted to deceive him, would effectually be confuted and silenced.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The true believer is convinced, that nothing in this world can satisfy the desires of his immortal soul ; and he therefore expects happiness from the eternal God, as his God and Portion. In his more lively frames, an inextinguishable thirst after the discoveries of his glory, and the experience of his grace and love, lead him to seek the Lord early, every day, with the best of his time and the prime of his affections. He likewise greatly values public ordinances, and when confined from them, or constrained to live among those who know not God, he regrets his loss, feels as one banished into a parched wilderness ; and, with a mixture of pleasure and pain, recollects, how he "has seen the power and glory of God in his sanctuary." This uneasiness, to which he is occasionally liable, arises from the same source with any other part of his experience, which is more habitual, especially when faith and hope are most in exercise : the world itself appears to him a weary desert, and he longs for the joys of heaven, of which he hath had some foretastes in the ordinances of God on earth. Yet even in this wilderness wells of salvation are opened, and his gracious thirst is in part allayed : and the want of stated means of grace sometimes excites more vigorous desires, and more earnestness in waiting on God in secret. The believer in this frame of mind values the loving kindness of God more than life ; and is even willing to depart hence, that he may fully enjoy it. This foretaste and prospect tune his heart and lips to praise the Lord, and to rejoice in the midst of tribulation : and he desires, as a sweet solace during his weary pilgrimage, "to bless the Lord while he lives, and to lift up his hands "in his name." Then the pleasures of the world lose their attraction ; "for his soul is satisfied, as with marrow and "fatness," whilst joyfully praising and thinking upon God : and such contemplations at once excite his gratitude, increase his confidence, and animate him in seeking conformity and nearness to the Lord ; aspiring after still greater attainments, as feeling himself upheld by the power of the Almighty. To mount with David towards heaven, in these exalted strains of devotion and zeal, should be our holy ambition : true Christians can in some measure, and at some times, appropriate his emphatical language : but, alas ! we too commonly have to complain "that our souls cleave to the dust." Let us then be more instant in prayer, that we may be quickened according to his word of promise. The enemies of such Christians as have been feebly described, are also enemies of Christ our King : present disgrace and eternal ruin will be their certain doom, if they persist in their enmity ; and the lies, with which they blaspheme the Redeemer, or slander his people, or deceive one another, shall be silenced in anguish and despair. But our King having now entered upon the joy set before him, all who bow before him, and swear fealty to him, shall rejoice and glory in God with him ; and obtain an honour and happiness infinitely superior to that of the most exalted throne on earth. And if the Israelites had reason to rejoice in their king, how much more should we glory in our King of righteousness and peace !

PSALM LXIV.

David, praying for deliverance, describes the malice and subtlety of his enemies, 1—6. He predicts their ruin, and the effects of it on the beholders, 7—10.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

HEAR my voice, O God, in my prayer: ^b preserve my life from fear of the enemy.

² Hide me from the ^d secret counsel of the wicked: ^e from the insurrection of the workers of iniquity:

³ Who ^f whet their tongue like a sword, and ^g bend their bows to shoot their arrows, even bitter words;

⁴ That they may ^h shoot in secret at ⁱ the perfect: ^k suddenly do they shoot at him, and fear not.

NOTES.

PSALM LXIV. V. 1. Fear. Thus our Liturgy, 'That we, surely trusting in thy defence, may not fear the power of any adversaries.' 'By thee, we being defended from the fear of our enemies.' Increasing our faith is as effectual an answer to these petitions, as removing the danger.

V. 2, 3. It is probable that the secret consultations of Saul and his courtiers against David, and the deceitful and violent measures they adopted in order to destroy him, gave occasion to this psalm. Open reproaches and false accusations wound like a sword in close fight: secret detraction slays like an arrow shot from a distance, or in the dark, or concealed from view.

V. 4, 5. David was not only an upright character, but he was perfectly innocent of those crimes which were laid to his charge: yet his enemies, not having the fear of God before their eyes, and being hardened against the dread of consequences, propagated their calumnies, secretly but very rapidly encouraging one another, and consulting together, in what way to ensnare and destroy him; fully expecting to escape detection, and acting as if God himself did not see them, or would not call them to account for their wickedness. (Marg. Ref.) 'Envy and malice crucified the Son of God: but during the course of their proceedings against him, you hear only of zeal for the law, and loyalty to Cæsar.' (Horne.)

V. 6. This verse may be rendered, perhaps more literally, "they search out iniquities: we are consumed by that which they have thoroughly searched out: for the inward part and the heart of man is very deep." Saul and his partizans searched, to find out some real or apparent iniquity, that David had committed, in order to cover the malice of their persecution: and they sedulously contrived new methods of perpetrating their crimes. Their intentions however, were carefully concealed: and the malice and dissimulation, and the wickedness of their hearts, were deep and unfathomable.

V. 7—9. While the persecutors were levelling their arrows, and about to shoot suddenly at David; God would unexpectedly cut them off; and their mortal wounds would be inflicted at once, while they were promising themselves complete success. Their blasphemies, perjuries, imprecations, and slanders, would, as an immense load of guilt, fall on them, and sink them into destruction. Their doom would be so dreadful, that the spectators would flee away, lest they should be involved in it: and all who heard of it would fear to imitate their conduct; be constrained to acknowledge the hand of God, and learning useful instruction from the awful dispensation, would cause others to understand it. Thus the benefit derived from it by numbers would illustrate the wisdom and goodness, as well as justice of God in his severity towards these wicked men. (Marg. Ref.) The dreadful imprecation of the Jews, when demanding our Lord's crucifixion, "His blood be on us and on our children," has indeed fallen upon them. The destruction of Jerusalem filled the beholders with terror, and forced them to acknowledge that it was the work of God. Even Titus, the Roman emperor, confessed that he had fought and conquered by the favour of the Almighty; and the nation of the Jews, scattered through the world affords a most instructive lesson to every land, and to all succeeding generations.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The continuance or renewal of our trials will render the repetition of the same petitions requisite: but varied expressions may often be affecting and useful to ourselves and others. When faith in God triumphs over the fear of powerful and malicious men, our prayers are certainly heard, and final deliverance from the danger will in due time follow. The most blameless will be reviled, and the most useful hated, by such men as took secret counsel and made open insurrection against the perfect and divine Saviour, and who whetted their tongues and shot their sarcasms against him, before they shed his blood. Such transgressors are often inwardly alarmed with the dread of consequences: but they encourage each other, till they flatter themselves with the hopes of impunity, and despise the all-seeing eye of God. Actuated by the most malignant enmity, with deep dissimulation they search out iniquities, that they may pretend zeal for God's glory, whilst they are murdering his people; (Matt. xxvi. 59:) but all their malice will rebound upon themselves, and God himself will fight against them, and destroy them: and all, who behold their doom in a future state, will reverence the power and justice of God in it. But it is our wisdom now to fear because of the judgments of God, and to flee from the wrath to come; to declare and consider his works, and to shun the rocks on which others have split. For the righteous alone can rejoice and trust in this holy Lord God: and all, who uprightly rely on his mercy, and seek to know and do his will, shall glory in him as their Salvation and eternal Portion.

NOTES.

PSALM LXV. V. 1. Some expositors think that this psalm was composed after the famine of three years, which occurred towards the close of David's reign; when God had heard the prayer of his people, and was entreated for the land: and the concluding part of it renders that opinion highly probable. 'It becomes us, O God, to praise thee in thy sanctuary, (though we cannot worthily express, but must rather silently adore thy incomparable excellencies;) and to pay the vows which we made unto thee in the time of our distress.' (Bp. Patrick.) The old testament church waited in silent expectation for the coming of the Messiah and the accomplishment of the promises, prepared then to burst forth into vocal praises and to perform her vows. Zion was the centre of her worship, and the type of the true church, whence alone cordial praises are rendered by us.

V. 2. The readiness of the Lord to answer prayer, when more extensively made known, would induce men of all nations to come and worship him on his mercy-seat in Zion: and the answer of the church's prayer, in the coming of the Messiah, would make way for the propagation of the Gospel among the Gentiles: till at length all the human race should come to God, as his suppliants. These events the Psalmist evidently predicted.

V. 3. 'Nor need their sins,' (the sins of those mentioned in the preceding verse,) 'discourage them: for thou hadst matter enough of that kind against me, to have hindered the prevalence of my prayer, if thou hadst charged my iniquities upon me. But thou hast been graciously pleased to forgive not only me, but my people, their transgression.' (Bp. Patrick.) 'O God, our iniquities stand in the way of thy mercies, and prevail strongly against all the endeavours of my reformation: but, do thou both mercifully forgive, and powerfully remedy, our offences.' (Bp. Hall.) 'He imputeth it to his sins, and the sins of the people, that God, who was accustomed to assist them, withdraw his succour.' The Psalmist evidently experienced, as the apostle did afterwards, that "when he would do good, evil was present with him:" and the mercy and grace of God through the promised Saviour to take away both the guilt and power of sin were his only support. Hoping for this deliverance from guilt and depravity, he determined to persist in waiting on God, seeking his glory, expecting his help, and celebrating his praises.

V. 4. Here the Psalmist seems to congratulate the priests and Levites, on their happiness, in being chosen to the sacred office of ministering to God in holy things, as their constant employment. But this was only an emblem of the spiritual priesthood, the chosen of God, to whom David belonged, though a king, and of Judah: and therefore he joins himself with those who would be satisfied with the rich provisions of the sanctuary, the spiritual communion with God, of which the feasts on the peace-offerings were an external sign.

V. 5. The terrible judgments, which God in righteousness inflicted upon Pharaoh, the Egyptians, the Canaanites, PSALM LXVI.

The Psalmist exhorts all men to observe the works of God, and to praise him with solemn awe and lively gratitude, 1—9. He shows how God had tried and delivered his people, 10—12. He determines to perform his vows; and declares how God had answered his prayers, 13—20.

render him praises, as he graciously fulfils his promises. Thus "praise waiteth for our God in Zion;" and thus are the vows performed, which continually accompany the prayers of his people. And we may urge this as a cogent plea for the granting of our petitions, seeing it will rebound to his glory. Nor can either the number or prevalence of those iniquities, for which we are humbled, invalidate the plea, when we come in the Redeemer's name: because, "as for our transgressions, he will purge them away," "to the praise of the glory of his grace."—Blessed indeed is that man whom the Lord chooseth, and by his spirit causeth to approach him in humble faith and prayer; and who, finding acceptance with him, learns to delight and be at home in his courts and ordinances.—We may find that satisfaction in the goodness of his house which others in vain expect from the world: and whilst we see these blessings spring from his special love and choice, we may rejoice at the prospect of their eternal completion in his holy temple above. It is, however, only through that blessed One, who was chosen to approach unto the Father, and to abide in the true tabernacle, as our Advocate, that we sinners can expect or experience this felicity: and through him, the God of our salvation is become the confidence of all the ends of the earth; even of us Britons too, who are afar off upon the sea. But these blessings communicated to mankind, in answer to the prayers of his people, have been attended with terrible vengeance upon opposers: still more dreadful things will accompany the further prevalence of the Gospel: and the complete salvation of the church will coincide with the eternal destruction of the ungodly. Nay, the Lord often answers the prayers of his people, with such convictions, rebukes, and corrections, as are for the time very terrifying unto them. But let us trust his power, truth, and love, and submit to his righteousness. The strength, which setteth fast the mountains, upholdeth the believer: the word, which stilleth the stormy ocean, can silence the tumult and rage of our most numerous and potent enemies: and he who enricheth the earth with such abundant and varied liberality, can neither want sufficiency nor bounty to feed the souls of his people. We should then adore him for the tokens of his power, in taking righteous vengeance on his enemies, and rejoice in beholding it displayed in mercy. We should with wonder, gratitude, and praise, behold and participate the abundance which, by the wise and kind providence of God, is diffused through the earth: and whilst we see year after year crowned with the goodness of the Lord; so that the hills and valleys, covered with corn and cattle, seem to rejoice in, and proclaim, their Creator's praise: we should remember our unworthiness, be thankful for our portion, and use it to the glory of the giver; admire and imitate his goodness to the wicked and ungrateful children of men; and pity and pray for those who abuse these gifts to the dishonour of the giver. But these temporal mercies to us unworthy creatures shadow forth more important blessings. The rising of the Sun of righteousness; and the pouring out of the Holy Ghost, that river of God, full of the waters of life and salvation, render the hearts of sinners, which before were hard, barren, and worthless, fruitful in every good work; and change the face of nations, more than the sun and rain do the face of nature. Wherever the Lord passes, by the preaching of his Gospel, attended by his Holy Spirit, his paths drop fatness, and numbers of every description are taught to rejoice in and praise him. These blessings have already been extended to many nations which were afar off: may we unite in prayers that they may descend upon the pastures of the wilderness; that the whole earth may hear and embrace the Gospel; and that all, who are favoured with the means of grace, may bring forth abundantly "those fruits of righteousness, which are through Jesus Christ, to the glory of God the Father."

NOTES.

PSALM LXVI. Title. The double title, A Song, a Psalm, is supposed by some to mean, a very joyful song of praise. The name of David is not affixed to this psalm; and various opinions have been entertained concerning the time, author, and occasion of it: some of which are sufficiently extravagant. But it is highly probable that it was written by David, when established on the throne, and made victorious over his enemies on every side.

V. 1—3. The Psalmist earnestly excites all the inhabitants of the land, (the word is singular in the original,) to exert their powers to the utmost in celebrating the praises of God, who had so interposed in their behalf; and executed such terrible punishment on their enemies, that many who inwardly disliked them and their religion, being alarmed by the power of his works, had reluctantly submitted themselves, and pretended to become the worshippers of JEHOVAH. This was an emblem of the effects produced by the Gospel in the first ages, when numbers, by the miracles wrought, and the judgments of God inflicted on the Jews and other opposers of Christianity, feigned submission, and embraced Christianity, without any real change of heart or character.

their existence as a nation: yet God had wonderfully preserved and delivered them; as a man's life is saved from imminent danger, or his health established after some very dangerous disease, or his steps upheld on the slippery brink of a precipice. The astonishing preservation of the Jews as a separate people, during their long continued dispersions and oppressions to this day, when it shall be crowned by their conversion to Christianity and restoration to the promised land, will constitute a still more extraordinary instance of the watchful care of Providence over that people, who in this particular are a sort of type both of the church and of individual believers.

V. 11, 12. The Lord had, for wise, righteous, and merciful reasons, brought Israel into a net, by inducing them to go down into Egypt and settle in that country.
 Their oppressors, having thus entangled them, laid heavy burdens on their loins, using them like beasts of burden.
 Nay, they were so powerful, cruel, and haughty, that they seemed to ride over their heads; and, having thrown them down, to trample them under foot. Yet from this situation, through fiery trials, through seas and rivers, God had brought them to rest and prosperity in Canaan.

V. 13, 14. The Psalmist, having stirred up the people to praise God for his general mercies to Israel, avows his intention of celebrating, with sacrifices and oblations, those deliverances which he had lately received, both personal and public; and thus to perform the vows which in the most open and solemn manner he had made, in the season of great danger and affliction.

V. 15. This verse may be literally rendered, "I will offer unto thee the burnt-sacrifices of fatlings, even rams with incense; I will prepare bullocks and goats." That is, 'I will liberally provide for every part of the service at the tabernacle.'

V. 16. The psalm, being given to the chief musician, was made public, and all might read it: but the Psalmist especially called the attention of those who feared God, or

V. 4. The words rendered all the earth, may mean all the land: this is not therefore so evidently a prophecy of a more enlarged dispensation than that of Moses, as many are which occur in these psalms; which were entirely overlooked by the Jews in the time of Christ. In like manner the clearest and most explicit predictions, that the kingdom of Christ shall at length be established all over the earth, are little attended to by numbers of Christians, but will most certainly be at length accomplished.

V. 5. 'He toucheth the slothful dulness of man, who is cold in the consideration of God's works.'

V. 6. The miraculous passage of Israel over the Red Sea which overwhelmed the Egyptians, and their secure march through the divided streams of Jordan, to possess Canaan and extirpate the inhabitants, are celebrated in this verse. All Israel rejoiced in the temporal benefits thus conferred on them; but the true church rejoiced in God their Saviour and Friend, and the display of his glory in these events. Israel, as the visible church from age to age, was considered as one body, which rejoiced and exulted on that occasion. Moses, Aaron, Miriam, and all Israel led the song of joyful praise on the banks of the Red Sea; and transmitted both the benefits and the grateful and triumphant remembrance of them to the next generation. Thus from age to age the church rejoiced and blessed God, in concert with those who were eye-witnesses of his wonderful works.

V. 7. 'He observes the motions of all nations, who may learn by the Egyptians and Canaanites, that they who contemn his authority, in vain endeavour to exalt themselves; for they shall certainly be abased.' (Bp.
 Patrick.) The last clause may be rendered "the rebellious shall not exalt themselves."

V. 9, 10. The dangers and distresses by which Israel had been tried and proved as in a furnace, during their bondage in Egypt, and afterwards in the time of the judges, and during some parts of Saul's reign, seemed to threaten were truly pious persons to this part of it; as they alone were prepared to enter into the spirit of it, to derive instruction from his experience, and to glorify God on his account.

V. 17. Extolled, &c. That dependence on God and expectation from him, and those spiritual affections, which are implied in believing prayer, are honourable to his power, truth, and love; so that he is extolled or magnified by them.

V. 18, 19. It is probable, that the Psalmist had not only been reproached with his past transgressions, but also charged with hypocrisy and a secret course of habitual sin: but the answer made to his prayers, 'brought along with' it a testimony of his sincerity, far more valuable than 'his kingdom. For had he been guilty of such crimes, or entertained so much as a thought of them, as his enemies charged him withal, the Lord, who hates iniquity, would have denied his request!' (Bp. Patrick.)—The original is, "If I looked at iniquity with my heart;" that is, if I thought of it with affection and desire. He that regards iniquity, entertains the thoughts of it as a man does welcome visitants. He provides for their entertainment, is reluctant to part with them; and as far as he can safely, he seeks and seizes the occasion of practising the sin which he thus thinks of with satisfaction. This evidences that the love and dominion of sin, is inconsistent with true repentance; and, if connected with a profession of religion, it is a clear evidence of hypocrisy. In this case God will not accept or answer a man's prayers. But if the consciousness of sin in the heart, or the intrusion of evil thoughts create uneasiness and a desire to be rid of them; if they be like the presence of an impertinent intruding visitant, or that of a dun to a moneyless debtor; this is an argument of sincerity in repentance, faith, and regard to God and his will; and God delights in the prayer of the upright. So that evident answers to solemn and particular prayers are attestations to a man's integrity.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The glorious perfections and works of God should induce all men in every land to delight in praising him, in singing forth the honour of his name, and in making his praise glorious; accounting it their highest honour thus to adore and glorify his name: and nothing but human depravity prevents this exercise from being as universal on earth as in heaven. But neither his exuberant goodness, nor his terrible judgments, nor the greatness of his power, can bring his enemies to more than a forced and feigned submission; except effectual grace new-create their hearts unto holiness. In this way; however, vast multitudes have been, by the Gospel, brought to be his willing servants and spiritual worshippers, and at length all the inhabitants of the earth shall sing his praise. It is very proper that sinners should be excited to "Come, and behold the works of the LORD, 19 But verily God hath heard me; he hath attended to the voice of my prayer.

20 ^a Blessed be God, which hath not turned away my prayer, nor his mercy from me.

"and how terrible he is in his doing toward the children of men;" that observing how "he ruleth by his power," over those who do not become his willing subjects; and how he beholds the nations, to hinder the rebellious from exalting themselves: they may see the necessity of seeking the favour of him whose wrath is so destructive; and that, considering the deliverances vouchsafed his people, they may desire to share their privileges. His servants also should consider his wonderful works, that they may be excited to bless their God, and "cause the voice of his praise to be heard:" and in the redemption of the death of Christ, and the glories that followed that grand event, they have more surprising and affecting subjects to contemplate, than Israel's deliverance from Egyptian bondage.—The Lord not only preserves our temporal life; but maintains that spiritual life which he hath communicated: nor will he suffer the feet of his servants to be moved to their utter casting down, by any of the difficulties of their path, or assaults of their enemies. Yet he will try their faith by affliction, as silver is tried in the fire; that it may be proved genuine and be further purified. Oppressions and persecutions, and even temptations, are on this account permitted as benefits to our souls: they indeed spring from the malice of men or devils; but we must receive them as prescribed by our God, to effect his gracious purposes.—Through various convictions, conflicts, and troubles, the slave of Satan escapes from his galling yoke, and obtains peace and joy in believing: and through much tribulation the believer must enter into the kingdom of God. Whilst our praises unite with those of the whole church of God, for general mercies vouchsafed from age to age; and our prayers for all that yet remains to be done: we must by no means overlook our own concerns. Under every trouble we should cry unto the Lord with our mouth and from our heart; and take occasion from our distressing situation, more solemnly to engage ourselves to his service. Then he will deem himself honoured by our worship: and when we obtain deliverance, we must pay the vows which our mouth hath spoken in the day of our distress. The sacrifice of the death of Christ hath superseded the legal obligations with which the ancient believers expressed their grateful zeal: but we must offer continually the sacrifices of praise and thanksgiving; our bodies must be presented as a living sacrifice unto the Lord, while our souls are as consecrated priests to him; and without grudging we must expend our substance "in doing good" to our brethren, and to all men as we have opportunity; "for with such sacrifices our God is well pleased." Besides the general example of gratitude for our mercies, which we publicly exhibit, we should more particularly declare unto those who fear God what he hath done for our souls, and how he hath heard and answered our prayers: they alone are capable of understanding, and will be edified and encouraged by our experience, and will join with us in prayer and praise; and this will turn to our mutual comfort, and to the glory of God. But without uprightness in our professed repentance, faith, and love, we cannot share these spiritual privileges: if we love iniquity in our hearts, though we refrain from the gross practice of it, the Lord will reject our hypocritical supplications. But the feeblest petition of the repenting sinner, coming from a broken heart, will by no means be despised: and when we pray in simplicity and godly sincerity, our requests will be evidently answered; and this will turn unto us for a testimony, increasing our assurance of the Lord's love to us, and exciting our gratitude to him, who "hath not" turned away our prayer nor his mercy from us."

NOTES.

PSALM LXVII. V. 1—3. It is probable that David composed this psalm: perhaps on the same occasion as the foregoing. It may be considered either as a prayer or as a prophecy: for the whole, being in the future tense, is more naturally interpreted as a prediction, than as a supplication. Most versions indeed render it as a prayer, and in this sense it is exceedingly animated: yet it may be doubted, whether the method of explaining the language of direct prophecy, as a mere wish or desire of the event, have not darkened the evidence from prophecy for the divine inspiration of Scripture, and damped the expectations, exertions, and prayers of pious persons for the enlargement of the church. Prophecy may easily be converted into prayer for its accomplishment: but the prayers even of inspired persons must not be considered as prophecies. — The believing remnant of the old testament-church here predicts or prays, that God would continue and complete his mercies to them, and bless them, shining on them as the enlightening, cheering, and fertilizing sun, and smiling on them as a loving Father. The effect of this would be, a general prevalence of truth and righteousness, of love, peace, joy, and all the fruits of the Spirit: and when the visible church became thus pure, united, and happy, it would powerfully conduce to its enlargement, till the day of the Lord would be known on earth, and that salvation, which heals the distempered souls of men, would reach all nations; and all the "Gentiles" would glorify God for his "mercy." This psalm is adopted into the liturgy of our church; and when it is read and attended to with understanding and affection, the prophecy is in part fulfilled. The substance also, of these verses, as a petition, is inserted in the excellent "prayer for all sorts and conditions of men:" though the order being reversed, the connexion between the purity and peace, and the enlargement of the church through all lands, is not so clearly maintained. The coming of Christ, "the Sun of Righteousness, who" "arose" on the land of Israel, "with healing in his" "wings:" the success of the Gospel in the primitive ages, and the future conversion of the nations to Christ, seem to have been predicted in the most unequivocal manner: nor can the prophecy be considered as fulfilled, while any part of the world remains in Pagan, Mahometan, or Jewish darkness; or while any part of the church continues in bondage to antichristian tyranny and superstition, or corrupted with heresy, and miserably divided, as it is at present.

V. 4. This is literally, "The nations shall be glad and sing for joy," &c. By the knowledge of God through the Gospel, the nations will rejoice in his righteous government, and in the prospect of his righteous judgment. And the establishment of his kingdom throughout the earth will fill the world with righteousness, and terminate all iniquity, oppression, fraud, licentiousness, and impiety.

V. 6, 7. These verses are translated as a prediction, the rest as a prayer: yet the original is uniformly the future tense; which is the language of express prediction, except when some connected clauses otherwise determine the sense. The increase is that which God gives, while his faithful servants plant and water; for our God blesses us, when he thus succeeds the work of his ministers: and we are assured that he will do this more and more, till the remotest regions; till China, Japan, Peru, and every corner of the earth shall remember themselves, fear the Lord, and become his worshippers.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The church on earth still needs God's mercy, and further blessings from him in performance of his promises. When he shines upon his people, and fills them with light, purity,

PSALM LXVIII.

David prays for, or predicts, the confusion and destruction of the wicked, and the joy of the righteous, 1—3. He praises the mercy and majesty of God, especially as shown in bringing Israel out of Egypt into Canaan, 4—14. Under the type of the ark of God taking possession of Zion, and the prosperity of Israel, he predicts the ascension of Christ, the rapid success of the gospel, and the punishment of obstinate opposers, 15—31. He exhorts all nations to praise the God of Israel, 31—35.

and consolation, it exceedingly tends to spread the knowledge of his salvation. None, except narrow-minded zealots for a party, would wish to confine the blessings of the gospel within any other limits, than the whole extent of the earth. They who have experienced the salutary efficacy of this invaluable medicine, would have all their fellow-sinners to share their felicity: and they who delight in praising God, would have all people to rejoice in him, and praise him with them; for his precepts are as equitable, as his mercies are abundant. Thus the examples, prayers, and endeavours of zealous Christians, make known the ways of God on earth. When the expected Redeemer came, the Gospel was preached to the Gentiles, and the earth at large began to give her increase. But, alas! a small part of mankind have hitherto embraced Christianity; but few real Christians comparatively are found even in the purest Christian countries; and lamentable divisions and offences prevail even among that remnant. We have therefore still need to pray, that 'our own God would be merciful to his church, and bless it with increasing knowledge, purity, and love; that every thing being removed, which tarnishes the beauty of the Christian religion, or weakens the endeavours of Christians to spread the Gospel, his saving health might be diffused through all nations: that our Redeemer might establish his righteous kingdom over all mankind; that they may yield a revenue of praise and glory to his name; and that all the ends of the earth may worship him in reverence and godly fear.' Amen.

NOTES.

PSALM LXVIII. V. 1—3. This psalm is supposed to have been written and used when the ark was carried up to Mount Zion. The first of these verses evidently refers to the words used by Moses, at the removal of the ark: (Note, Num. x. 35;) but the sacred name JEHOVAH, used in that passage, is here changed for ELOHIM, or God: and the future tense in the first clause is substituted instead of the imperative; the language of prediction for that of prayer.

Indeed the whole version, more literally than the present, renders the whole of these verses as a prophecy. "God will arise, and his enemies shall be scattered," &c.—The Psalmist looked back to the former mercies of God to Israel, and presaged further prosperity to his people, now the symbol of God's presence had taken possession of its appointed residence among them. The presence of God with Israel had dissipated the force and projects of those who hated him and them, as the cloud of smoke is dispersed by the wind, or as the wax is liquified by the fire. And while the wicked had perished at his presence, the righteous had often expressed their admiring gratitude and joy, in every imaginable way. Thus it had been of old; thus it would certainly be in future times; and thus the worshippers prayed that it might be then, and at all times.

V. 4. (Note, Deut. xxxiii. 26.) JAH is an abbreviation of JEHOVAH, and signifies self-existence and eternity. This name is used very frequently, in conjunction with Hallelu: forming the word Hallelujah. Or, Praise JAH, or JEHOVAH. He, who derives his being from none, but gives being to all, is engaged by promise and covenant to protect and bless his people, who are on that account, as well as others, called on to extol and rejoice in him.

V. 5, 6. This God of immutable majesty and glory, whose ark, the symbol of his presence, abode in the sanctuary, as typical of the human nature of Jesus Christ, his true temple, in which he will dwell for ever: was the condescending Patron of orphans, widows, and all destitute persons. They who had lost their relations in Egypt and the wilderness, were brought into other families in Israel, and settled in Canaan: the people who had been in cruel bondage to Pharaoh were set at liberty; but as the surviving rebellious Egyptians inhabited a country desolated by divine judgments, so the rebellious Israelites dwelt during forty years in the barren wilderness. The calling of the Gentiles, and the rejection of the unbelieving Jews, seem likewise to have been predicted.

V. 7, 8. When JEHOVAH, evidently displayed his glory from the pillar of fire and cloud, conducted Israel in triumph out of Egypt and through the wilderness; the whole creation seemed to stand in awe of the Creator.—The earth trembled, the heavens poured down impetuous showers, while the sea divided to open a path for Israel, and returned to overwhelm their pursuers.—But especially, when the people were encamped before Sinai, that mountain shook to its foundations, at the presence of Israel's God. (Note, Judg. v. 4, 5.)

V. 9, 10. The awful displays of JEHOVAH's glory were not more extraordinary than his gracious interpositions in behalf of his people. In order to provide for their urgent wants, "He commanded the clouds from above, and opened the doors of heaven; and rained down manna upon them to eat." "He rained flesh also upon them as dust, and feathered fowl like as the sand of the sea." Thus they were plentifully supplied, and their hearts were confirmed, or strengthened and encouraged, when wearied with marching through the wilderness. They dwelt in the midst of their provisions; and the poorest of them were as sufficiently provided for, as if they had inhabited Canaan when rendered most fruitful by the early and latter rains.—The word rendered, Thy congregation, seems to mean any living thing; and to mark out in one general term the immense multitude of living creatures which were in this astonishing manner continually maintained. The Septuagint render it Thy living creatures.—Considering the psalm as predictive and descriptive of the ascension of the Saviour, our thoughts are naturally led to the events that followed, and many parts of it are finally applicable to those events. In this view, how weary and barren was the visible church at the death of Christ! but what a gracious and refreshing rain was soon sent down upon it in the pouring forth of the Spirit at the day of Pentecost and afterwards! What provision was then made for the poor souls who had long waited for redemption in Israel, or who had groped in darkness in other lands.

V. 11, 12. In many instances the Lord himself "gave the word," commanding the Israelites to march against their enemies, or to go forward regardless of them: and when he had given his people the victory, he put into their mouths the words of praise and thanksgiving.—Then, "great was the army of those that published it."—The word is feminine; and the Psalmist seems to allude to the custom of the women in companies, joining to celebrate the successes of the nation with songs of praise and triumph, as Miriam and the women of Israel, and Deborah, and others did. (Marg. Ref.)—So decided were their victories, that while the kings commanding vast armies fled with the greatest precipitation, but in vain, the spoil which was taken was so large, that even the women who remained at home received a share of it. (Marg. Ref.) Thus when our Lord, having risen as a conqueror from the grave, gave the word to preach his gospel, vast numbers were raised up to publish the glad tidings: opposing rulers and empires fell before them; and millions have shared the blessings who were exempted from the persecutions and sufferings, which apostles and evangelists endured.—It is also remarkable, that the whole of these verses is in the future tense; and therefore, though properly applied, as the language of poetry to past events, it may well be considered as prophetic likewise.

V. 13. Israel, making bricks in Egypt, and lodging like slaves between the rows of the kilns or furnaces, being covered with clay and smoke, appeared very mean: but when possessed of Canaan, during the reigns of David and Solomon, they appeared in beauty and splendour; and still more so, as they were a holy people unto the Lord. Thus the slaves of Satan, when converted to Christ, being justified and sanctified by him, begin to look comely and honourable; and when they shall arrive in heaven, all remains of their sinful estate shall disappear, and they shall be as "the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold."

V. 14. When the Almighty scattered and destroyed the kings of Canaan by or for his church, (the dove mentioned in the preceding verse; for the words are feminine;) she not only became very honourable; but was also so purified from sin and adorned with holiness, that she appeared like the top of Salmon when covered with snow.—The generation which fought under Joshua was peculiarly excellent: and under the judges, and in after ages, they were generally reformed before they were delivered and made victorious. But the original is in the future tense, and seems an evident prediction, under allusions to these past events, of the purity of the church, and the success of the gospel, in the primitive ages, and at the approach of the millennium. nineteenth chapter of Revelation seems to be a prophetic exposition of this verse, far more striking than any which can be found in the history of Israel.

V. 15, 16. It is supposed that this part of the psalm was sung, when the company attending the ark came within view of mount Zion. If the former of these verses be read with notes of interrogation, the passage may be thus rendered, "The hill of God, is it the hill of Bashan? "The hill with craggy eminences, the hill of Bashan? "Why leap ye so," (or why look ye askance with envy;) "ye hills with craggy eminences?" (or ye lofty hills?) "This is the hill which God desireth for his habitation; "yea, JEHOVAH will dwell in it perpetually." The apostrophe is exceedingly animated and poetical, viewed in this light. God had preferred Zion to the loftiest mountains, as the place of his permanent residence, and the type of his true church in which he will dwell to eternity.

V. 17. The God of Israel is here described as a mighty Prince and Conqueror coming to his palace to possess his throne, with a vast army of chariots and horsemen: as his thousands of angels were a far more splendid retinue than ever attended the greatest monarch. Thus he descended upon mount Sinai: thus he would dwell upon mount Zion: thus the Messiah ascended into heaven, attended with an innumerable company of angels: and thus he shall at length come to judge the world. The original word does not seem to mean angels; yet they are evidently intended. — The marginal reading many thousands is more literal.

V. 18. When the ark was placed upon mount Zion, the tabernacle was enriched with the spoils of the vanquished nations, which were there despoiled for the benefit of the Israelites, notwithstanding their rebellions, that "the Lord God might dwell among them:" and of these spoils the temple was chiefly built. But the ascension of Christ must here be meant, who is thus proved to be JEHOVAH: when he ascended into heaven he led captive Satan, sin, and death, which had held all men in captivity; and he received, as the purchase of his death, all those gifts which were needful, in order to the conversion of sinners and completing the salvation of believers: these he continually bestows on those for whom he received them; even on rebellious men, that the Lord God may dwell amongst them, as their Friend and Father. The apostle both cites this passage, and explains it in respect of the gifts bestowed. He does not, however, take it from the Septuagint, but gives the sense in other words. To receive a gift for another implies giving it. Some render the word translated for men, in man, as referring to the human nature of Christ. The original name or title here is JAH, the God.

V. 19, 20. The preceding review of the Lord's dealings with his church caused the Psalmist to break forth abruptly into adoring praises. This must have had vast effect, when sung by the numerous bands which attended the ark, accompanied with instrumental music, in great variety and perfection. The God of salvation day by day, or every day, heaped benefits on his people, and should therefore be praised every day. Unto him, even God the Lord, belong the outgoings from death. Life and death, heaven and hell, are absolutely at his disposal. The Lord Jesus is "the Resurrection and the Life." He has "the keys of death and hell;" He has "opened the gates of everlasting life to all believers," he has made a way for their escape from spiritual and eternal death, and he will raise their bodies incorruptible and immortal.

V. 21. The gifts received by the ascended Saviour, though for rebellious man, would not preserve such from destruction as went on still in their sins. The God of salvation, while he pardons and blesses the repenting rebel, is peculiarly terrible to the impenitent and unbelieving. — The hairy scalp means, the crown of the head, the principal strength, confidence, and glory of the enemy. Christ will crush the serpent's head. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 22, 23. The Lord had promised to save Israel from their enemies by the hand of David: he would therefore renew the wonders which he wrought, when Og king of Bashan was slain, and when the Egyptians perished at the Red Sea. The ascension of Christ made way for most signal displays of the Lord's power, in spreading the Gospel, and in taking vengeance on his enemies: and the more glorious prevalence of Christianity shall be attended with such slaughter of anti-christian opposers, as will literally verify the words here used. As the verses follow the prophecy of our Lord's ascension, these events seem more directly predicted; and especially the conversion of the Jews, their restoration to their own land, and the vengeance on those who shall oppose them. (Notes, Ex. xxxviii. xxxix.)

V. 24, 25. When the solemnity of the day was nearly finished, these verses seem to have been sung. The congregation had been spectators of the triumphant manner, in which their God and King had gone up to take possession of his sanctuary, attended with sacred music and rejoicing: He had accepted their services; and all was so happily concluded, as to presage future prosperous days. Thus the prophecy of the Son of David, (the King of kings and Lord of lords,) going forth to destroy his enemies and enlarge his kingdom, is introduced by a vision of "Much" "people in heaven, saying Allelujah, Salvation, and "glory, and honour, and power unto the Lord our God, " &c." (Rev. xix.) A scene not unlike, but immensely more august, than that procession with the Ark to mount Zion, which was the pledge of David's further victories and prosperity.

V. 26. From, &c. That is, 'We that spring from the "Fountain," or the stock of Israel.' Thus the people in companies seem responsively to have called upon each other, to bless the Lord.

V. 27. The tribe of Benjamin, from which Saul the first king of Israel sprang, joined in this solemnity, as willingly subject to David; and though a small tribe, descended from Jacob's youngest son, and now eclipsed by Judah, whose princes supported David by their counsels, it manifested no jealousy nor envy. Not only the rulers of the other tribes in the vicinity of Jerusalem attended on this occasion, but those of Zebulun and Naphtali which lay most remote: so harmonious was the whole nation on this occasion! Thus after Christ's ascension, rival nations and people, near and far off, thronged into his church.

V. 28. The people seem here to have addressed the king. The LORD his God had commanded all parties thus to strengthen his interests, and had effected their willing submission; and they prayed, that he would establish what he had by him wrought for his people, in preserving the unity of the nation, and increasing its prosperity.

V. 29. The word rendered temple is used for the tabernacle: (1 Sam. iii. 5.) yet it is probable, that David spoke this prophetically, and foretold that the temple, which was to be built at Jerusalem, would render the worship there performed so much known, that kings would bring presents and oblations to ИЕHOVAH, to be offered there. This was a figure of the conversion of the kings of the earth unto Christ in the latter days.

V. 30. The same word is here rendered company, which is before translated congregation, but which signifies a living creature: (Note, 10.) and it seems in this place to mean a wild beast. The whole verse may be thus rendered: 'Rebuke the wild beast of the reeds, the congregation of 'the mighty among the calves of the nations skipping or 'exulting, with pieces of silver; scatter the people that 'delight in war.' (Horne.) Many interpret the beast of the reed, to mean the crocodile, the emblem of Egypt; and the calves of the nations, the objects of the Egyptian idolatry: while their skipping with pieces of silver is supposed to refer to the rites of their worship. As, however, David was not attacked by the Egyptians, or about to make war on them, this interpretation is not very satisfactory. The beast of the reed or lance, seems to denote a warrior, fierce as a wild beast, perhaps Hadadezer king of Syria. "The "multitude of the bulls and the calves of the people" were the powerful and numerous commanders, with their troops; and I apprehend the prayer is 'Lord, rebuke them, 'enraged and strong as they are, till they lay themselves down for us to set our feet on their necks, and supplicate 'their lives, offering pieces of silver for tribute, as owning 'themselves subject to us. Yea, "scatter the people that 'delight in war," "as they evidently do." (Notes, 2 Sam. viii. x.) It is no doubt to be considered also as a typical prophecy, and prayer of the church for a decided victory over the most furious and haughty of her oppressors and persecutors.

over the surrounding nations, would induce even those that were more distant, and most addicted to idolatry, to come to Jerusalem, and join themselves to the worshippers of the true God. (Marg. Ref.) The conversion of the nations, in consequence of the judgments of God on the opposers of the Gospel, in the primitive times, and before the millennium, is evidently foretold : for the kingdoms of the earth are called upon to join in the praises of Israel : and to adore him who rode on the heavens to the help of his people, (Note, Deut. xxxiii. 26.) and who spake with a mighty voice to them from mount Sinai. When the Messiah ascended on high, to "the glory which he had with the Father before the world was," He sent forth the powerful word of his gospel, calling on all men to submit to him, "and honour him even as they honoured the Father that sent him."

V. 34, 35. All the perfections of God, which are his excellency, concur in protecting his church. The power which made the clouds and rules the highest heavens, is exerted in behalf of his people and communicated to them, "out of his holy places;" the sanctuary of old, as the type of "heaven itself," whither the Forerunner is for us entered; and whence especially he is terrible to his enemies.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-17.

When the Lord arises to plead the cause of his people, the confederated power of those who hate him will be dissipated and dissolved; and at length all the wicked will perish at his presence. The same displays of his power and glory will rejoice the righteous; and words cannot express the cause they have, and will have, to triumph in their unchangeable Friend, and to celebrate his praises. His condescension is equal to his majesty: he always patronizes the afflicted and oppressed; and poor sinners, helpless and exposed more than any fatherless children, are readily admitted into his family, and share all the blessings of that high relation. Indeed all the company of his chosen were once bound in Satan's chains, and employed in a baser drudgery than that of making bricks; and far more wretched and abject, than the Israelites in Egypt. But when he comes to break off their chains, and claim them for his own, he leads them forth to liberty, to victory, and to eternal glory. They are made willing to follow him, and he goes before them: heaven and earth concur in supplying their wants, and promoting their salvation: difficulties in their path only make way for their almighty Friend to show his care of them: he guides and guards them; he feeds their souls with the Bread of heaven, and gives them the waters of life to drink: and whilst he graciously prepares for the souls of the poor in spirit, he will not withhold what is needful for their bodies. They reap the benefit of the Redeemer's victories; and, fighting under his banner and by his word of command, they profit by the assaults of every enemy; until complete salvation render those white as snow in Salmon, and beautiful beyond all that is lovely in the visible creation, who once were most mean and loathsome, through the guilt and defilement of their sins.

V. 18-35.

The death of our Redeemer was the price of all the blessings which he confers on sinners, and his resurrection and ascension were the earnest. When he ascended on high, our God declared his church of ransomed sinners to be his residence, which he greatly desired and delighted in; whilst in its exalted Head "all the fulness of the Godhead dwelleth bodily." He now reigns over heaven, and earth, and hell, with unlimited authority. In vain do kings or nations envy or oppose his sovereignty: all must submit, or be destroyed by him; and his wrath is more dreadful from mount Zion than it was from mount Sinai.— Having led our oppressors captive, he hath received gifts for rebellious man, which he never refuses to those who humbly sue for them; and they who partake of them, become thenceforth "an habitation of God through the Spirit." The gift of his written word, and of the ministry of his gospel, are vouchsafed to our land: He gave the word, great was the multitude of those who published it; and they have been raised up successively even to the present day: may he give commandment that thousands more may be raised up, to go forth and preach the gospel in every part of the earth! And may we, may all the inhabitants of Britain, profit by our peculiar privileges! If we have embraced from our hearts this proffered mercy, let us "bless the Lord who daily loadeth us with benefits." Our God is the God of salvation: he hath quickened us when dead in sin, and will not leave us till he hath brought us to glory, honour, and eternal life. But he will crush the serpent's head, and utterly destroy all those who go on still in their trespasses: for his mercies to his church will be attended with judgment on his enemies, till the complete salvation of the one be accompanied with the final ruin of the other. And as our Lord and King condescends to come and dwell among his people, let us observe the tokens of his presence; and let all of every rank, age, and sex, concur in blessing his name: for union and harmony are the stability of the church. All our strength is in and from the Lord; and if he have begun to communicate his grace to our souls, we may pray in faith, that he would daily establish that which he hath wrought for and in us. May he speedily so strengthen his cause upon earth, that all the proud, idolatrous, and oppressive, all that delight in war, or maintain opposition to his church, may be scattered and brought down; that all kings and nations may share the blessings of his gospel, and sing praises to his name. May these predictions be fulfilled in their most extensive meaning, that all the inhabitants of the world may adore and rejoice in his excellency over Israel; and that he may no longer be terrible to any of them out of his holy places! And whilst all unite in ascribing power and dominion unto him, may all experience strength communicated from him, enabling them to resist temptation, and to overcome every enemy of their salvation: that one nation may call upon another to bless the Lord, and all on earth may form one general chorus, like that of angels in heaven, continually saying with alacrity and gratitude, “Blessed be “God,” even the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, throughout all ages, for evermore!

NOTES.

PSALM LXIX. V. 1—3. It is probable, that David, in great distress during Absalom's rebellion, composed this psalm with reference to his own case: but the Holy Spirit evidently spake “of the sufferings of Christ, and the glory “that followed.” Indeed it is so manifest a prophecy of Christ, that we should consider him as the speaker in most parts of it. In these verses he compares himself to a man sinking in the mire, whilst the floods of waters go over his head. His sufferings from the hands of wicked men, from the powers of hell beneath, and from the justice of the Father, whilst external torment united with internal agony to enhance his distress, were thus represented with peculiar propriety. He continued to cry for help, till his throat was parched with thirst, and his eyes grew dim, and failed in the agonies of death: whilst, in perfect faith and patience, but in the extremity of conflict, he waited for his God to deliver him.

V. 4. The multitudes who hated the Lord Jesus without a cause, nay, though his miracles of mercy alone merited their most grateful love, and who demanded his crucifixion, could not be numbered. The rulers of the Jews and of the Romans who had all the power in their hands, were ^a combined to destroy him, being his enemies wrongfully. Then did he make restitution for our robbery and satisfaction for our crimes, and restored that honour to the divine law which he had not taken away. David indeed was hated wrongfully, and in many things receded from his right: but these concluding words were far more emphatically verified in Christ.

V. 5. ‘O God, the righteous Judge, I make my ‘appeal to thee, who knowest the very worst of me; and ‘protest that, whatever my mistakes, or my wilful sins may ‘have been,—I never did them any injury, nor gave them ‘any cause to persecute me.” (Bp. Patrick.) The words, as spoken by David, have no difficulty: yet they may be considered, as an appeal to the heart-searching God for his general integrity, as well as a confession of folly and sin in many instances. If applied to the Lord Jesus, as spoken by him, they must be interpreted of our folly and iniquity being imputed to him; as the debt which he had not contracted, but was required to pay; the robbery which he had not committed, but was made answerable for. Thus many expositors understand the verse: though perhaps it should be explained as the language of the type, rather than of the Antitype.

V. 6, 7. These verses may be explained either as a prayer or a prediction; being in the future tense. David prayed, that his sufferings might not prove an occasion of sin or discouragement to his pious brethren; because he was persecuted and reproached, not for his crimes, but for his religion. Thus St. Paul earnestly desired that the Ephesians might not faint because of his sufferings on their account. But the case of our Lord's disciples, of those who “trusted that it was he that should redeem “Israel;” while they witnessed the contempt and cruelty which he endured, and the ignominious death which he submitted to, and while he lay in the grave, seems most emphatically described. He, however, foretold, that their sorrow should be turned into joy; being assured, that “he suffered—the just for the unjust, that he might “bring us to God.”

V. 8, 9. The Lord Jesus "came to his own, but his own received him not;" his countrymen called him a Samaritan who had a devil: "neither did his brethren believe on him," and the inhabitants of Nazareth, where he had been brought up, attempted to destroy him. Because his zeal for the honour of the law, and the purity of the worship of God, which entirely occupied his soul, and raised him above all inferior considerations, and his plain reproofs of hypocrisy and iniquity, exasperated the mercenary and worthless teachers and rulers of the Jews, and set all orders of men against him. In calumniating him, they ascribed the miracles which he wrought by the Spirit of God to Beelzebub; and in many ways they reproached God, in reproaching his beloved Son, who was the express image of his Person; for "they both saw and hated both him and his Father." As two apostles have quoted this verse, with express application to Christ, we are warranted in explaining it as a direct prophecy of him, or even as his words. But the usage which David experienced from his son Absalom, his relations, his counsellors, and his subjects, chiefly for his zeal, for the honour of God, and true religion, rendered him a striking type of Christ in this respect, and doubtless occasioned this complaint.

V. 10—12. The Lord of glory voluntarily became a man of sorrows. "In the likeness of sinful flesh," and as a poor man, he appeared in the habit of humiliation, as if he had been a penitent in sackcloth. He wept, and fasted, and prayed, and he was despised and reproached for it. He was called "a Samaritan who had a devil," a Nazarene, and "this deceiver;" and he was made a by-word and a proverb to the people. The chief priest and rulers, who sat as judges in the gate, with deliberate malice conspired his death: and the very drunkards profanely made songs of him and diverted themselves amidst their intemperate revels, by reviling and ridiculing him. Something of this kind had befallen David: but Jesus was far more derided and abhorred. (Marg. Ref.)—The Septuagint renders the first clause in these verses, "I bowed down my soul with fasting." The word chastened is not in the original, and seems not so well to suit the case as afflicted or humbled would have done.

V. 13. Acceptable, &c. Or, a time of good will, or special favour. 'Knowing, that albeit I now suffer trouble; yet thou hast a time wherein thou hast appointed my deliverance.' 'I commend myself with the greatest earnestness unto thee, O LORD, who, now that I am so despicable, wilt think it, I hope, the fittest time for my deliverance.' (Bp. Patrick.) When the Redeemer was enduring his extremest sufferings, that he might glorify God and save the souls of his people, it was an acceptable time for his prayers in behalf of himself and them. Through him it is an acceptable time for our prayers, when his Gospel is preached to us, and his Spirit is striving with us.

V. 14, 15. The original, beginning with the language of prayer, and proceeding in that of assured confidence, by a change of the imperative for the future, has great animation; "Deliver me from the mire, and I shall not sink: I shall be delivered from those that hate me," &c. This last expression explains the meaning of the figurative language in these verses, and in the beginning of the psalm. They contain the prayer and expectation of the Redeemer in the depth of his humiliation, when his enemies and sufferings seemed about entirely to overwhelm him: but he knew that his soul would not be left in the place of separate spirits, nor his body in the grave to see corruption; but that his resurrection and exaltation would make way for him to accomplish his purposes of love.

V. 16—20. To understand, and be suitably affected, with these verses, it is peculiarly necessary to compare them with the history given by the Evangelists of our Lord's agony in the garden, and his sufferings on the cross.

24 ^m Pour out thine indignation upon them, and let thy wrathful anger ⁿ take hold of them.

25 ^o Let their * habitation be desolate;

—In the garden, "his soul was exceedingly sorrowful, even unto death," and in "his agony he prayed more earnestly:" but so far from having any one to condole with him or comfort him, the apostles themselves could not "watch with him one hour." Having then been betrayed by Judas, denied by Peter, and forsaken by all, he was nailed to the cross, surrounded by his cruel enemies, who reproached and insulted him to the utmost; and in this extremity he exclaimed also, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" He had not at this crisis the comfort of his Father's manifested loving-kindness, which he knew to be good, yea, better than life: but he "hid his face from him." And while he suffered for sinners, that the multitude of God's mercies might be shown to them; he was excluded from mercy: men showed him no mercy, and he was smitten with the sword of divine justice. But he prayed with strong crying and tears; and he was heard speedily, and rescued from his foes and from death.

V. 21. The word rendered gall, signifies any thing either poisonous, or exceedingly bitter. The literal accomplishment of this verse in the case of our Lord, is one instance out of many of the particularity with which the circumstances of his passion were described by "holy men" of God, who spake as they were moved by the Holy "Ghost." But the vinegar and the gall were but a feeble emblem of that bitter cup which he exhausted, that we might drink the cup of salvation. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 22—28. Some commentators read this awful passage entirely in the future tense, as a prediction and not an imprecation: but many of the verbs are in the imperative; and what is more, the apostles quote the passage as an imprecation. (Acts i. 20. Rom. xi. 9, 10.) If we consider the passage as the language of Christ, denouncing the doom of his implacable enemies, and as recorded to be a warning to others, no reasonable objection can be made to this interpretation: for in reading it, we only assent to the justice of the sentence. (Notes, Deut. xxvii. 15.) As our example, Christ on the cross prayed for his crucifiers; and his prayer was answered in the conversion of numbers of them: but being exalted upon his throne, he asks of the Father, and receives from him, authority to break in pieces with his iron rod all obstinate opposers, as well as to save all humble supplicants. Jewish nation is here prophetically described. Not only were their temporal advantages made an occasion of mischief to them: but depending on those sacrifices and institutions, which were originally appointed for the good of their souls; and ensnared in their own counsels, they persisted both in enmity to Christ, and in resistance to the Romans. Being shut up in Jerusalem, when they were assembled to eat the passover, "their table became their 'snare:'" infatuated beyond all example, and disunited among themselves, the horrors of intestine massacres weakened and terrified them: at length the Romans, the instruments of the Lord's indignation, got possession of the city with most dreadful slaughter, destroyed the temple, (the palace here mentioned: Marg.) and desolated their city and habitations, so that none of them were left to dwell there. The remnant of the nation were cast out of the church, and left in judicial darkness to add iniquity to iniquity, without obtaining an interest in God's righteousness. Thus they have been blotted out of the register, in which the true people of God, the heirs of heaven, are enrolled, and are no longer written among the righteous: and all this was laid on them for rejecting and crucifying the Messiah, with the most determined contempt and cruelty. The twenty-fifth verse is applied by St. Peter to the traitor Judas, "who was guide to them that took Jesus;" and thus a proper representative of the apostate but hypocritical nation, that as with one voice demanded, even while celebrating the passover, the crucifixion of their Prince and Saviour. But the original word rendered habitation, meaning a palace, the destruction of the temple, that pride of the nation, seems also predicted: and when our Lord said, "Your house is left unto you desolate;" he may be supposed to have referred to this passage. Some render the words, translated "Add iniquity unto their iniquity," add punishment to their iniquity: but the original does not properly admit of that construction, and the marginal references will show, that to be given up to wickedness is the punishment often in awful justice awarded to obstinate transgressors. 'It were to be wished,' (says Dr. Horne on the twenty-sixth verse,) 'that the sorrows of the penitent, when wounded with a sense of sin, never subjected him to the scorn and contempt of those who would be thought Christians.'

V. 29. Let, &c. Or, "Thy salvation, O God, shall set me up on high." Thus the Saviour, in the depth of his passion and humiliation, anticipates his exaltation "far above all heavens, that he might fill all things."

V. 30, 31. 'Here, as in the twenty-second and many other psalms, the scene changes from sorrow to joy; from suffering to triumph; from the passion to the resurrection.' (Horne.) The praises of the great Redeemer and of his redeemed church; and indeed his whole work, with the eternal glory thence redounding to the God of salvation, are far more acceptable to him than the sacrifices of the law ever had been in themselves: but when the Jews rejected Christ, and preferred their sacrifices; these, even though clean animals offered according to the law, became abominable; because a declaration of their unbelief and their refusal to submit to the righteousness of God.

V. 32. (Note, xxii. 26.) The meek and humble, hearing of the Saviour's sufferings and exaltation, will rejoice; and the souls of all that seek the Lord, shall through his atonement be made partakers of life spiritual and eternal. —In how many millions of instances hath this already been fulfilled!

V. 33. His prisoners. Those who are bound in prison, as enslaved to sin and condemned for their crimes, when awakened, (by God's preventing grace as his elect,) to seek deliverance, shall not be despised; but on the contrary shall, through the Redeemer's intercession, be brought into "the glorious liberty of the children of God." —Some explain the words, of those who were cast into prison, by such as persecuted the preachers of the Gospel and those who follow them. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 34. 'The mercies of God in Christ are such, that they cannot worthily be praised by any thing less, than an universal chorus of the whole creation.' (Horne.)

V. 35, 36. Zion seems to denote the church at large, the cities of Judah, the several divisions of the church throughout the world; evangelical blessings being predicted under allusions taken from the then existing state of things. —God will preserve his church, and every sound part of it, and all true Christians; continuing to them, and entailing on their posterity, the blessings of the new covenant. —Yea, all that love God shall dwell for ever in Zion, in the church militant on earth, without being finally overcome by any enemy, and in the church triumphant in heaven. Perhaps the future conversion of the Jews also was here foretold.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—21.

It behooves us carefully to examine, whether the things that pertain to the Lord Jesus form as important a part of our religion, as they do of the holy scriptures? And, whether our judgment, experience, and affections, are, as it were, imbued with them, as the word of God is in all its parts? that whilst the prophecies, as compared with the accomplishment, confirm our belief that the Bible is a divine revelation: our hope may rest on the foundation laid, and our conduct be influenced by the motives proposed therein. We cannot too often be called to contemplate the scene, here again presented to our minds. We should frequently consider the person of the Sufferer spoken of; and inquire wherefore, as well as what, he suffered? That beholding the son of God incarnate, overwhelmed by his inexpressible sorrows; bereft of comfort, seeming in vain to cry for relief, conflicting with Satan's horrid temptations, and even bearing the wrath of God for us; that viewing him hated without cause, and apparently left in the power of cruel enemies, treated as a stranger and an alien by his brethren and people, reproached, insulted, derided, condemned by the rulers, and made the sport of the soldiers and the vilest of the multitude; betrayed, denied, or forsaken by his disciples; nailed to the cross, and mocked, when athirst, with vinegar mingled with gall to drink: that meditating on these scenes, we may be led to deeper humiliation for sin, to a greater admiration of the justice and mercy of our God, a higher valuation of our immortal souls, a clearer conviction of our danger, and the vanity of every other dependence except on his great atonement; a fuller perception of our infinite obligations to our gracious Redeemer, and a more lively gratitude and love constraining us to live to his glory. Let us further learn hence to expect the enmity of the many and the mighty, of our relatives, and of those whom we have most served. We may perhaps plead that they hate us wrongfully and without cause: but our foolishness and our sins are not hidden from God; and, alas! they too often appear to man, and give malice that occasion which it sought against us. We need not, however, be discouraged, when reproached and put to shame for the Lord's sake; if our zeal for the truths, precepts, and worship of God, in some small measure resembling that of our Redeemer, should disgust and exasperate our neighbours, and make our former friends treat us as strangers: if they, whose words and works reproach the Lord, should despise and revile us for his sake; if even judges and rulers should speak against us, and if drunkards should make their songs of us, and turn our godly sorrow, our tenderness of conscience, our deadness to the world, and even our prayers for them, into derision and mockery. Whatever deep waters of affliction or temptation we are sinking into; whatever floods of trouble, or ungodly men, seem ready to overwhelm us; we should persevere in prayer, and in waiting on our God to save us; though we be weary, and as it were hoarse, with crying for help, and our eyes be ready to fail with looking for deliverance: and the more men despise and desert us, the more earnest should be our cries unto the Lord to help and comfort us. Such extremities will be found acceptable times of approach to God, if we plead with him the multitude of his mercies, and the truth of those promises which secure the believer's salvation: but we should in these emergencies remember others, who seek the Lord; and pray for them, that they may not be ashamed or discouraged through our afflictions or misconduct. He who brought the Redeemer from the grave, and exalted him above all his enemies, will hear those who come in his name: he will deliver them out of temptation and affliction: and with his refreshing loving-kindness he will turn unto them and comfort them, and that speedily: and he will at length receive their souls, and raise their bodies from the grave, and thus rescue them from every enemy. Indeed reproach and contempt are hard to bear, and fill our hearts with heaviness; and we may, at some times, look in vain for compassion or comfort from our fellow-creatures. But the Redeemer exhausted that cup of wrath, which contained nothing but vinegar and gall; and he will infuse sweetness into all our sorrows. We need not therefore fear suffering with or for him.

V. 22—36.

Now, in this acceptable time, we should all fear coming short of the salvation set before us; and lest any of us should suffer as the enemies of Christ from his awful indignation. For many, besides the nation of the Jews, have had their table made their snare, and the things which should have been for their welfare, a trap to them; because they have opposed or neglected his salvation; many are given up to judicial blindness and to desperation: the hot displeasure of God pursues them from their habitation on earth; and being driven away in their wickedness, they add iniquity to iniquity, and that for ever; for they are "blotted out of the book of the living, and are not written among the righteous." Let us then fear lest this should be our case, and be careful not to "persecute those whom God hath smitten: or to speak to the grief of those whom he hath wounded." Let us call upon the Lord in the present acceptable time, without further delay: and then, though we be not only poor and sorrowful, but guilty and defiled, the salvation of God will set us up on high. And not only the atonement of the Redeemer, but the praises of the redeemed, who magnify the name of the Lord with thanksgiving, are more pleasing to him than bullocks with horns and hoofs. The humble will perceive and rejoice in these encouraging truths, and the souls of those who seek the Lord according to this blessed gospel shall live for ever. Through our exalted Advocate he will hear the prayers of those who have been the prisoners of Satan, when they long for liberty and salvation; and he will not despise the poorest or the vilest who trust in him. "Let then heaven and earth praise him, the sea, and every thing that moveth therein:" for God will protect and save his church, and enlarge her borders; that his people may dwell there, and have it in possession. He will bless them and their children after them; a seed shall serve him on earth, and his servants shall inherit his heavenly kingdom; and they that love his name, shall dwell before him for ever. "He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all; how shall he not with him also freely give us all things?"

NOTES.

PSALM LXX. V. 1—5. (Notes, xl. 13—17.) This psalm is, for substance, the same as the concluding verses of the fortieth psalm: yet there are verbal alterations in every part of it, though none that materially affect the sense. Some think that it was parted from the fortieth psalm, (with some variation,) as suggesting general hints for prayer to pious persons, under very afflictive circumstances.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

No worldly possessions or distinctions can prevent the humbled sinner from feeling himself to be poor and needy: hence his entire dependence upon a merciful God, and his fervent applications to him on all occasions; whilst the proud can only pray formally and hypocritically. But the poor in spirit have God for their Helper and Deliverer; and shame must be the portion of all who seek after their souls, desire their hurt, or rejoice in their calamities. Sometimes these are so ashamed as to repent and seek forgiveness: but unless this be the case, they will be treated as the enemies of Christ; as they tread in the steps of those who persecuted him, in his poverty and humiliation; for they hate his image and his cause in his poor disciples. But they who seek the Lord and love his salvation, have the prayers of all God's people on earth, and the intercession of Christ in heaven in their behalf. Joy and gladness will therefore be vouchsafed them: and they will eternally magnify the God of their salvation.

NOTES.

PSALM LXXI. V. 1. The name of David is not prefixed to this beautiful psalm: yet there can be no doubt but he wrote it during Absalom's rebellion; and probably at the crisis when he heard of the sanguinary counsel which Ahithophel had given respecting him. (2 Sam. xvii. 1—3. 21.) This verse may be rendered, "In thee, O LORD, do I put my trust; I shall never be put to confusion."

V. 2. Thy righteousness. "It is a righteous thing with God to recompense tribulation to them that trouble his people, and to them which are troubled, rest," and deliverance. This kind of appeal to the justice of God in David's circumstances seems the most natural interpretation. But some suppose the faithfulness of God to his promises to be meant, and others explain the words as spoken of that "righteousness of God which is unto all and upon all them that believe."

V. 3. The idea of an impregnable fortress, in a country liable to be invaded by powerful enemies, with a ready admission on any emergency, and habitual residence in it, admirably illustrates the believer's privilege of access to God at all times; with the security and confidence which spring from a due improvement of it. The promises which God had made to David and his posterity by Solomon, were such express declarations of his purposes, as amounted to a commandment to save him, which all the servants of God in heaven and earth ought to concur in performing. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4. The unrighteous and cruel man. That is, Ahithophel.

V. 5, 6. David was conscious that he had trusted God from his early youth; and the recollection of the numerous instances, in which the Lord had answered his expectations and prayers through a long course of years, not only encouraged his confidence, but animated him to praise and gratitude amidst all difficulties. In this he was a feeble type of Christ, who with infinite condescension passed through the state of childhood and youth for our sakes, and without the least spot of sin.

V. 7. Numbers no doubt wondered that David should meet with such uncommon afflictions, and perhaps suspected him of some prodigious wickedness which he contrived to hide from men: many might wonder at his unabated confidence in God; and be anxious to know, whether he would be delivered or not: and others might be astonished to see him protected and comforted under his afflictions, and especially at the wonderful deliverances he had experienced. "Christ in his state of humiliation upon earth was 'a sign every where spoken against.'" "The Christian who quits possession for reversion, and who chooses to suffer with his Saviour here, that he may reign with him hereafter, appears to the men of the world as a monster of folly and enthusiasm. But God is the 'strong Refuge' of all such." (Horne.)

V. 8, 9. Or, "My mouth shall be filled, &c." "Thou wilt not cast me off, in my old age, nor forsake me, &c." "Such is my full purpose and unabated confidence." This literal rendering seems more animated, than translating the verses merely as a prayer, which con-

30 ^p Now also, [†] when I am old and veys the idea of doubt and discouragement. It was a prayer indeed; but couched in the language of assured hope. David had long served God and been useful to Israel; but he was not capable of such services as formerly, and his rebellious son and ungrateful people rejected and despised his authority. He was, however, fully persuaded that God, who had favoured and helped him all his life long, would not cast him off in his old age.

V. 10, 11. Absalom, Ahithophel, and the other conspirators, while they consulted together to destroy David, may be supposed to have excused their own detestable wickedness, by charging him with many real or supposed crimes: and it is probable they spoke most virulently of his conduct in respect of Uriah and Bathsheba. Persuading themselves, therefore, that David had, by that scandalous folly, forfeited the divine protection, which they could not deny that he had formerly enjoyed, when he slew Goliath, was delivered from Saul, and made victorious over the surrounding nations; they concluded that God had forsaken him; and that they might proceed in persecuting him, with confidence of success, for there was now no Deliverer. But David, while submissively enduring the correction of his heavenly Father, was conscious that he had deeply repented, and had obtained forgiveness. He was also aware, that impious contempt of God united with enmity to himself, in the conduct of his foes: and thence he deduced arguments to strengthen his assurance, that God would for his own glory rescue his persecuted servant from his impious persecutors. They who consulted to put our Lord to death, and tried to find accusations against him, could not but own that he had wrought many miracles; yet when they prevailed so far as to get him nailed to the cross, they insulted him, as if God had finally forsaken him. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12. 'O my God, who hast hitherto so wonderfully preserved me, let this vain-confidence and insulting language of my subjects, incline thee to make the greater speed to relieve me.' (Bp. Patrick.) The first clause is future, 'Thou wilt not be far from me; haste thee to help me.' As if David had said, 'I know that thou wilt not finally forsake me; but the extremity of my case makes me earnest for speedy deliverance.'

V. 13—15. These verses throughout are in the future tense; the language of prediction, or confident expectation, and not necessarily of imprecation. It might not be so material to observe this if many had not taken occasion, from the latter interpretation, to charge the man after God's own heart with malevolence and a revengeful spirit; and to represent the Old Testament as sanctioning such a spirit, though unsuitable to the evangelical dispensation. Nay, some very pious and respectable persons have admitted charges of this kind to a very great extent: but they are highly dishonourable to God. His perfections and commandments, his holiness, and the sanctifying work of the Holy Spirit, are unchangeably the same. And there is no reason to think, that David has recorded one prayer in the psalms, which St. Paul would in similar circumstances have scrupled. When he spake as the type of Christ, or by the Spirit of prophecy, he might very properly either predict or denounce destruction on those that persisted in opposing him; as the apostle says, "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maranatha!" And when he was engaged in devotion or meditation, he might, in assured faith, foresee the ruin of his own wicked persecutors, such as Saul and Ahithophel, and even pray for their confusion, as the apostle said of Alexander the coppersmith, "The Lord reward him according to his works;" being fully persuaded that he was given over to a reprobate mind, and if not restrained would do a great deal of mischief to the church of God.—'Because thy benefits to me are innumerable, I cannot but continually meditate upon and rehearse them.'

V. 16. The Psalmist, in the sharp and perilous contest in which he was engaged, determined to trust in the power of God for deliverance; and to mention his righteousness alone. He had not deserved from his son and subjects the ill usage which he received from them: he would not, however, attempt to justify himself before God; but would submit to, yea, adore his righteousness under this heavy trial; committing his cause to him as a righteous Judge, without the least reserve. The Christian also goes forth to conflict with his enemies, in the strength of the Lord; and mentions the righteousness of Christ, the righteousness of God by faith, as the only meritorious cause of his acceptance: and many think David here spoke of that righteousness as the ground of his confidence. Others interpret it of the Lord's faithfulness to his promises: but the foregoing sense seems most to agree with the context.

V. 17, 18. David had early been taught by the Spirit of God the way of truth and holiness, and been employed in many useful services during a long course of years; especially by declaring the wondrous works of God as the sweet Psalmist of Israel: and he prayed in the language of confident expectation, that he might be preserved in his old age, till he had completed this work, and shown more fully the power of God, and his glorious perfections and kingdom, not only to that but all future generations.—The usefulness of his psalms to the whole church; in all successive ages, is a most wonderful performance of this, whether considered as a prayer or a prediction; for many of his psalms, especially some of those which conclude them, seem to have been written, and the complete arrangement of the Psalmody at the tabernacle to have been made, after this time.

V. 19. The methods by which God governs the world in righteousness, are so high that man cannot comprehend them. This is peculiarly the case in respect of the harmony of mercy and truth with justice in the mediatorial government of Jesus Christ, and the way in which believers are made the righteousness of God in him.

V. 20, 21. David had already been carried through many and sore troubles; and now in the depth of his present distress he was like one that is dead and buried: but he expected that God would revive him; and not only restore him to his former comforts, but abundantly increase them; nor was he disappointed. He likewise seems here to have spoken as the type of Christ, under his deepest humiliation, expecting his resurrection and exaltation to the throne of glory.

V. 22-24. This exulting anticipation of the high praises which, with heart-felt joy and gratitude, the Psalmist expected to sing to his great Deliverer and Benefactor, using every method of making them more solemn and triumphant, when it is considered as his language in the depth of distress, is very remarkable; and shows the strength of his faith, the confidence of his hope, and the fervency of his piety. The truth or faithfulness of God is here mentioned distinctly, as well as his righteousness. David had grounded his confidence on the divine promises, and referred the cause between him and his rebellious subject to the decision of divine justice, both of which he would celebrate continually, when he had received that merciful deliverance and redemption which he was hourly expecting.

22 I will also praise thee with the * psaltery, even thy truth, O my God: unto thee will I sing with the harp, O thou Holy One of Israel.

23 My lips shall greatly rejoice when I sing unto thee; and my soul which thou hast redeemed.

24 My tongue also shall talk of thy righteousness all the day long: for they are confounded, for they are brought unto shame, that seek my hurt.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is very honourable to the mercy of God, that his word encourages even sinners to plead their confidence in him, as a reason why he should save and help them. He always inclines his ear to the prayer of faith: and they who trust in him, and seek all their happiness from him, shall never be put to shame. His power, truth, and love, will be their residence and fortress, to which they may always resort; and in which they will be secure and comfortable even amidst troubles and alarms. He hath given commandment to save them, not only from unrighteous and cruel men, but from the wicked and cruel enemies of their souls. Happy therefore are all who make the Lord their hope: but most happy they who have been taught by him, and so have trusted him from their youth; and who with advancing years have acquired increasing experience of his faithfulness and mercy. As he formed each of us, and took us out of our mother's womb, and by him we have been holden up ever since; our praise ought to be always of him: but, alas, how few grow up in his fear, and spend their lives to his glory! It is, indeed, a great mercy to young people to be early instructed in the things of God: parents have an important obligation upon them in this respect; and children who are thus favoured have additional reasons to love, honour, and requite their parents. Yet let none of us expect much quiet in this world: they who, from their earliest youth, have loved the Lord and declared his wondrous works, and walked before him in truth and equity, have often been showed sore troubles, and have been exceedingly hated and persecuted: nay, they have been "men wondered at," for their principles, their conduct, and their trials. Their enemies have often thought that God had forsaken them, and that they could crush them with ease and impunity: but reproach and dishonour have at length come upon those that laid wait for their soul, while they have hoped continually, and praised God more and more. Indeed their leading desire is, that their "mouths might be filled with his praise and honour all the day long:" in their best moments, they only wish to live on earth, to show forth the righteousness and salvation of God, to his glory, and the encouragement of his people: and the subject is so copious, and the blessings and the instances of his love are so numerous, that they can never recount them all. They, therefore, who would recommend this salvation to others, as well as ensure it to themselves, must "go forth in the strength of the Lord “God, and make mention of his righteousness only.” Indeed as old age approaches, our strength in many respects will fail us: but God will not cast off his gray-headed servants, when they are no longer capable of labouring as they have done. And his people should imitate his example, in their conduct towards such as have spent their health and strength in their service. He, indeed, often favours his aged servants with peculiar vigour in their souls, when nature is sinking into decay; that their faith, hope, love, and joy, may show to all around them what a faithful Friend He is to his people. The experienced believer in such circumstances ought to speak of the perfections and works of God, to his neighbours; and if able he will do well to leave some testimony of his happy experience and decided judgment upon record for posterity; to show his “strength to the present generation, and his power to all them who are yet for to come.” But God is so exalted, that it is far above our ability to praise him worthily: he hath done great things, and there is none like unto him: yet the everlasting righteousness which was brought in when the Redeemer had passed through his great and sore troubles, and was raised again from the depths of the earth, and exalted to the throne of glory, demands our most admiring gratitude and praise. Resting our hopes on that foundation, we may bear up under our lighter trials, and even go down with confidence into the grave: for the Lord will receive our souls, which he hath redeemed; and will quicken our bodies also, and raise them from the dust of the earth again, and thus increase our greatness, and comfort us on every side. Anticipating this final deliverance and victory, let us here spend our days, whilst waiting the approach of death, in praising the Holy One of Israel with all our powers and attainments: and whilst we are speaking of his righteousness, and singing unto him, we shall rise superior to our fears and infirmities, and have sweet earnest of the joys of heaven.

NOTES.

PSALM LXXII. Title. ‘David had the satisfaction to see all the great men do homage to Solomon before he died: and thereupon the spirit of this holy man being transported with an extraordinary joy, he indited this psalm, in which he recommends Solomon to the divine benediction, and instructs him how to make his people happy; which he carries in so high a strain that the words had not a full accomplishment, till the appearing of that great King, Christ, of whose kingdom his father David here prophesies.’ (Bp. Patrick.) ‘The aged monarch of Israel, being about to resign the kingdom into the hands of his son Solomon, makes unto God the request of a wise father for him. He asks such a portion of wisdom and integrity from above as might enable the young Prince to govern the people of God, and exhibit a fair resemblance of the Messiah.’ (Horne.) The prayer of Solomon, for wisdom to govern Israel, was evidently grounded on the instructions of this psalm, which shows how deeply he was impressed by it. (Notes, 1 Kings iii.)

V. 1, 2. Solomon was both king and the king's son; which no king of Israel had before been; and his pious father ardently desired, that “the wisdom of God might be in him to do justice;” that he might understand the statutes and laws of God, and copy his righteousness in his administration; especially in exercising his authority to defend and redress the wrongs, and relieve the distresses of the poor: that so his reign might be an apt resemblance, as it was an evident type of the kingdom of the Messiah; of whom the whole psalm must be considered as a prophecy, and many of the expressions in it can be interpreted of no other.

V. 3. The peace and righteousness of Solomon's reign were visible in the mountains and hills, covered with vines, corn, and cattle; the people quietly gathering in their abundance, and enjoying it, without fear of invasion or oppression; and the magistrates, both superior and inferior, being exact in administering justice. Thus the Redeemer's kingdom, established in mercy, and governed in peace and righteousness, produces abundantly the fruits of holiness, in all places where it is truly established.

V. 4-7. 'As this is true of godly kings, so it is chiefly verified in Christ, who, with his heavenly dew, maketh his church ever to flourish.' 'But he sheweth wherefore the sword is committed to kings: to wit, to defend the innocent and suppress the wicked.' Solomon reigned only forty years, and his kingdom lost much of its splendour when left to his descendants; and even the kingdom of Judah, as continued to them, terminated in a few centuries: but Christ shall reign through all generations to the end of time. Solomon's peaceful and equitable administration was refreshing and beneficial, as the gentle showers upon the new mown-grounds, or on the grass when parched by the burning sun. But the effects of the Gospel of Christ, accompanied by the influences of the Holy Spirit, are thus aptly described. By it the distressed conscience is comforted, the barren heart made fruitful, and the beauties of holiness communicated, where before vice and deformity alone were visible. If then the righteous flourished and were multiplied in Solomon's peaceful reign, much more has this been, and will this be, the effect of the setting up of the kingdom of our Prince of Peace; and more especially in the latter ages of the world; when it is foretold that men "shall learn war no more."

V. 8-11. Solomon reigned from the river of Egypt, and the coast of the Mediterranean sea, to the Euphrates, and perhaps to the Persian gulf, into which the Euphrates runs. The inhabitants of the desert countries that lay betwixt submitted to him, and opposition as it were lay prostrate before him. The queen of Sheba came to Jerusalem with munificent presents, and all the kings round about brought tribute or gifts to him. Yet this faintly shadowed forth the Redeemer's kingdom. The prophet Zechariah, however, uses these very words in foretelling the extent of it. (Marg. Ref.) The wise men from the East first with their presents hailed the new-born King of the Jews, (15.) His kingdom hath already been set up in many nations, and a full completion of these predictions will at length take place; when all "kings shall indeed fall down before him, (as his worshippers,) all nations shall serve him." —It is absurd to interpret this of the forced submission, which even the wicked will make to Christ at the day of judgment: for how will they serve him by "going away into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his

"angels?" No doubt the millennium is here foretold.

V. 12, 13. 'They shall be induced to these submissions —by the fame of his justice, mercy, and compassion, (wherein he shall resemble the Lord Christ:) for no sooner shall any miserable wretch who hath no friend in the world, implore his protection, but he shall instantly succour him.' (Bp. Patrick.) The verses, however, more properly express the spiritual blessings of Christ's kingdom, than any temporal effects of the very best government on earth.

V. 14. Solomon, as a wise and good king, was tender of the blood of his subjects: he put none to death by the sword of justice when mercy could safely be exercised: and he did not waste their blood in needless wars. But the Redeemer shed his own blood to save the souls of his people; he does not expose them to unnecessary sufferings; and when they shed their blood for his sake, it is precious in his sight, and will be abundantly recompensed to them, and avenged on their persecutors.

V. 15. During the course of a long and prosperous reign, Solomon received tribute from the Arabians and other nations; and they who solicited his favour brought him presents. The continuance of his life was prayed for by his pious subjects; and numbers joined them in bestowing daily the highest commendations on him. (Marg. Ref.) But in these things he was no more than a type of the Messiah. The ancient church from the beginning prayed for his coming: his church now prays for the success of his Gospel; prayers are continually ascending through him for the blessings of his salvation; while praises and adorations are presented before him, by his people in every part of the world, yea, by all the inhabitants of heaven.—The clause rendered "Prayer also shall be rendered for him continually," is translated in the common prayer-book, "Prayer shall be made even unto him;" and by the Septuagint, 'They shall pray continually concerning him.' The original seems exactly to mean on account of him: and thus may be understood, either of the prayers offered for his coming, and the success of his Gospel; and those daily presented through his intercession, and on the grounds of his merits and atonement. No doubt prayer as well as praise is daily offered to him, throughout the whole church: but this does not appear to be the meaning of the words.

Jer. xxviii. 6. Rev. i. 18. xxii. 20.—y 2 Sam. xxiii. 1. Job xxxi. 40. Jer. li. 64. Luke xxiv. 51.

V. 16. A handful of corn sown on the ridge of a mountain, the least fertile part of the country; yet producing a crop so strong and thick, that when waving in the wind, it would resemble the forests of Lebanon, is the allusion here used to illustrate the fruitfulness of Canaan in this favoured reign. In consequence, the inhabitants of Jerusalem would become numerous as the blades of grass. The old translation of the last clause runs thus, "the children shall flourish out of the city, like the grass of the earth." It is a prediction of a vastly increased population, and all abundantly provided for. The rapid promulgation of christianity, from small beginnings, among the Gentiles as well as Jews; the numerous converts raised up, strong in faith, holy in their lives, and filled with consolation; and the continual increase and abundant provisions made for these inhabitants of the new Jerusalem, were thus, in a striking manner, typically predicted.

V. 17—19. These verses contain a most extraordinary prediction of Christ and his kingdom; and notwithstanding Solomon's durable and extensive renown, they can scarcely be at all applied to him, without enervating their energy. "Behold a greater than Solomon is here!" The clause rendered, "Men shall be blessed in him; all nations shall call him blessed," seems to mean, "All nations, while 'blessed in him,' or finding happiness in him, 'shall call him blessed,' or celebrate his praises. The wonderful things which God alone hath done and will do, in blessing the nations of the earth, by the kingdom of Christ, entirely eclipse the glory of the wonders he wrought for Israel in placing Solomon over them:—The last clause is future; and may be exactly rendered, "The whole earth 'shall be filled with his glory;' being a prediction of the universal prevalence of the kingdom of Christ, and the display of the glory of God in him. (Marg. Ref.) To this the Psalmist and all the people added Amen, Amen. Be it so—Be it so; 'Let the whole earth be filled with the glory of God and of Christ. (Notes, 1 Chr. xxix.) Blessed, therefore, be thou, O Lord Jesus, for thou art the Lord God, even the God of Israel, who hast wrought such miracles of mercy for the salvation of thy church: and blessed by the tongues of men and angels be thy holy and glorious name: and let the whole earth be filled with thy most excellent glory. So be it, So be it.' (Horne.) Perhaps the eighteenth verse may be considered as addressed to the God and Father, of our Lord Jesus, and the beginning of the nineteenth to the divine Saviour.

V. 20. The dying Psalmist, having thus prayed for, and foreseen his son's prosperous reign; and having looked forward to the coming of the Redeemer, and viewed the whole earth filled with his glory, had no more to ask or to do, but to lie down and rest in hope.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Pious parents will be the more earnest in prayer for their children; in proportion to the importance of those stations which they are to occupy in society, and in the church of God: and they who have faithfully served their generation, and are going to rest, will be equally attentive to the interests of posterity, especially with respect to true religion. As it is in every way so important to mankind, that rulers should be men of wisdom and righteousness, protectors of the industrious poor, and terrors to evil-doers of every degree: it becomes the duty of every man, to pray that God would give the king, and all legislators and magistrates, his judgments and righteousness, that "they may judge the people with righteousness and the poor with judgment." And princes should be reminded by such as have access to them, that they are the vicegerents of God, to whom they must give an account of their authority, and that they ought to imitate him in their government. Whilst we therefore meditate on the nature of the Redeemer's kingdom, let it be observed, that in this respect he is especially an example to all rulers, and will be imitated by all such as are wise and righteous. The wisdom and justice, as well as authority, of God are in him. He is the King of righteousness and of peace: and having once "made peace by the blood of his cross," he brings all spiritual blessings on sinners, as a harvest springing forth in every part of the earth. The poor in spirit, the broken hearted apply for and obtain from him peace of conscience, that peace of God which passeth understanding: but he will crush the obstinate, the proud, and the impenitent. By the warnings and encouragements of his gospel, multitudes through successive generations are brought to fear, submit to, and worship God: and this shall be more and more the case, as long as the sun and moon endure. His gracious truths, attended by the influences of his Spirit, distil like the refreshing and fructifying rain upon the parched earth; and holiness, comfort, and usefulness are the never-failing effects. Thus in his days the righteous flourish, and, whilst they enjoy abundance of peace, are multiplied exceedingly. His people are taught to behave with such equity, truth, and love; and so to bear with and forgive each other, and to follow peace with all men; that as far as his kingdom is really set up, discords and contentions cease, in families, churches, and nations: and he defends his harmless subjects, against those who would

V. 1. The Psalmist, after much consideration, and a sharp conflict with temptation, thus abruptly expressed his assurance that, notwithstanding appearances, the Lord was kind to his true people who served him in uprightness of heart. The same distinction between an Israelite by nation, and the true Israelite, which is often made in the New Testament, is here explicitly established.

V. 4. Wicked men often spend their lives without much sickness, and end them without great pain: whilst many pious persons scarcely know what health is, and die with great sufferings. Nay, numbers of the wicked are so hardened in presumption, that they die without terror or remorse. The original may be rendered, "They have no bands till their death." They are not put in chains for execution like condemned criminals; but are let alone, till they are taken out of the world like other men. "There are neither pangs of body, nor remorse and terror of soul, in their death." (Bp. Hall.)

V. 5. "The wealthy sinner,—far from poverty, and free from disease, seems to pass his days exempted from the miseries of mankind, without labour and anxiety; and not so much as to think of those who, distressed on all sides, can scarcely earn their bread by the sweat of their brows." (Horne.)

V. 6—9. The haughtiness of these prosperous ungodly men appeared in their external decorations; nay, they counted that display of their pride, which is falsely called magnificence, their highest ornament; as conquerors and other eminent persons wore chains of gold round their necks for decoration and distinction. (Marg. Ref.) At the same time, their whole conduct was so notorious for violence and oppression, that they were covered with them as with a garment. Perhaps it is also implied, that their violence bore the expense of their ostentation, which they gratified in rich garments and costly ornaments. They likewise indulged and pampered their bodies in the most luxurious treat them with deceit and violence. He delivers the needy perishing sinner, when he crieth unto him, from the tyranny and oppression of Satan: he spares believers though they deserve punishment, and saves their souls from destruction; he redeems them from all their enemies, "and precious shall their blood be in his sight." Thus he becomes precious to their hearts, and love of him constraineth them to live devoted to his service and glory. The good seed of his Gospel, being, as it were, but a handful, sown upon the before barren mountains of the Gentile world, hath already produced an immense increase of believers, fruitful in good works, to the glory of God, and the benefit of mankind: and they shall still increase more and more. His dominion hath already extended very wide; many kings and nations have become his subjects; and many of his enemies have licked the dust. In due time "all kings shall fall down before him, all nations shall do him service:" he shall crush the head of the great oppressor, and destroy all who withstand his cause: his name and glory shall endure as long as the sun; and men shall be blessed in him, and agree to call him blessed for evermore. May we then submit to his authority, and partake of his righteousness and peace: may we daily celebrate his praises, and bless the God of Israel for the wonders of redeeming love! May we spend our days, and end our lives, praying for the success of his Gospel, and longing for that time when the whole earth shall be filled with his glory! Amen and Amen.

NOTES.

PSALM LXXIII. Title. This and several of the following psalms are ascribed to Asaph, in the same mode of expression by which others are ascribed to David: yet some think that David wrote them, and only delivered them to Asaph to be set to music or sung; while others think that another Asaph, in later ages, wrote some of them.

manner: and their looks discovered their excessive sensuality and voluptuousness. Yet they reserved more from their enormous expenses, than a wise man would wish for; or more than they formerly could have thought of: such unexpected success attended them!—But instead of being thankful for their abundance, their corrupt passions were thus exceedingly strengthened and inflamed: and, so far from restraining or concealing them, they openly gloried in them, avowing their designs and politic methods of oppressing the poor, and crushing opposition: despising the laws of man, and even those of Almighty God; and haughtily uniting to their licentious, selfish, and unfeeling conversation, the language of infidelity or atheism; saying, not “within themselves,” but openly, I neither “fear God” nor regard man;” thus setting the Judge of the world at defiance, and propagating far and wide their pernicious and impious principles. Alas! how many are there in modern times, that seem to have set for the odious and detestable portrait here exhibited. ‘A circle of fawning dependents’ is never wanting, to whom the vain and ignorant wretch, exalted in his own conceit above the level of mortality, may, from the chair without controul, dictate libertinism and infidelity.’ (Horne.)

V. 10. This verse is generally allowed to be very difficult, and a variety of discordant interpretations have been given of it. The original may literally be rendered, “On this account his people shall return thither, and waters of fulness shall be wrung out to them.” His people seems to mean the people of God, who witnessing the prosperity of the wicked, and experiencing many sorrows and hardships, were tempted to “return thither,” (i. e. to the company of the ungodly) in order to share their ease and pleasure: but the consequence in general was, that “waters of a full cup were wrung out to them;” they brought many chastisements and sorrows on themselves, and were oppressed with sorrow for their guilt and folly. ‘Not only the reprobate, but also the people of God, fall back seeing the prosperous state of the wicked, and are overwhelmed with sorrows: thinking that God considereth not aright the state of the godly.’—The verse is in the future, and it seems most natural to explain it, as the Psalmist’s apprehension, that the prosperity of daring sinners would eventually prove an invincible temptation, and a great source of sorrow to believers. The clause, “waters of a full cup are wrung out to them,” probably refers to the cups of liquor mingled with poison, which were in those days given to criminals: but whether it refer to the inordinate sorrow of tempted believers under their own sufferings, contrasted with beholding the success and indulgence of the wicked; or to the painful consequences of yielding to the temptation, and imitating those whom they envied, must remain doubtful.

V. 11. This verse is by some interpreted in connexion with the foregoing, as the language of the tempted believer, who is even induced by what he feels and witnesses, to adopt the language of the ungodly, and to question, Whether God do indeed know, and take cognizance of human affairs. This interpretation rises naturally from the words: but as it is by others thought that pious persons cannot well be supposed to use such infidel language, they conclude that the Psalmist here returns to his subject, and that the profligates above described are again introduced.

V. 12—14. ‘These blasphemous wretches—are the men that prosper in the world—What then are we to think of God, of his providence, and his promises?—All my faith, my charity, and devotions, all my watching and fastings,—all the labour and pains I have taken—have been altogether vain and fruitless.’ (Horne.)—The clause, “Washed my hands in innocency,” seems equivalent to St. Paul’s words, “Herein do I exercise myself to have a conscience void of offence towards God and man.”

V. 15—17. The Psalmist having related the progress of his temptation till it came to the crisis; next shows how by faith and grace he prevailed against it. In his greatest despondency, he could not but respect and wish well to the generation of God’s children; and he considered, that if he gave utterance to such sentiments as had arisen within him, they would grieve, condemn, or deceive them, and so cause them to offend. He therefore purposed to acquire a full understanding of the mystery in Providence; and in the mean while to keep silence: but the more he reflected and reasoned on the subject, the deeper was his conviction, that it was too difficult for him, and the greater perplexity he experienced: until he went at length into the sanctuary of God, to consult the priests, the Lord’s ministers, and examine his word, and spread the case before him in prayer; and then he was enabled to understand the end and final doom of prosperous sinners, so that he could no longer envy them, or complain of his own condition.

V. 18—22. By the light of truth and the eye of faith, the Psalmist clearly saw, that prosperous ungodly men stand on the slippery summit of a tremendous precipice; whence in the appointed time God casts them down by death, with a fall equal to the height to which they were mounted. In a moment they were desolated and ruined, and overwhelmed with terrors. The dread of death and judgment spoiled their enjoyment; and the death of one, terrified the survivors. So that their happiness was but a transient disturbed dream of pleasure: and God poured contempt upon this lifeless image of felicity: when arising to take vengeance, he by death awakened them to see substantial good for ever lost, and real misery unavoidable and eternal. These considerations made him sensible of his sin and folly in envying such wretched men. He was deeply ashamed, on recollecting the ferment of his heart, and the effect produced even upon his animal frame without any sufficient cause. And he appeared to himself, and knew that he must appear in the sight of God, to be ignorant and stupid as a beast, which has no conception of any other good than present sensual enjoyment.

V. 23—28. Emerging from his temptation, the Psalmist found his heart humbled, and his valuation of spiritual blessings greatly enhanced. He reflected with pleasure and gratitude on his privileges as a believer. He was persuaded that he was under the immediate care of an ever-present, wise, and faithful Friend, who had hitherto upheld him, especially under this urgent temptation, as a tender parent holds his child by the hand, lest he should fall and hurt himself. He was assured that the Lord would guide him in wisdom through life, and at death receive him to glory: nor could any thing in heaven or on earth be worthy of being put in competition with his favour, or necessary to his happiness in accession to it. He relied on none of the real or supposed inhabitants of heaven: he expected not his future happiness from the society of the most exalted or excellent creatures; he did not delight even in his earthly friends and comforts, when compared with the Fountain of felicity, who was in every respect his All in all. He was aware that his body would speedily decay, his natural spirits fail, and his heart no longer beat; but God would strengthen and support his soul in that last conflict, which would terminate all his sorrows, and then He would be his eternal Portion: whilst the most prosperous of those, who were alienated from God and under his wrath, must perish; and Israelites especially, who brake their national covenant, by apostacy, idolatry, and rebellion against God, would be more severely punished than others. But for his part, he was satisfied that it was good, (advantageous, pleasant, and honourable,) for him to wait upon God, and walk with him, confiding in his mercy, and celebrating his praises, whatever should be his outward circumstances and situation. Thus the psalm concludes with the language of assured hope and joyful anticipation of future and eternal glory in heaven: and as the sinners above described, are supposed to prosper even to the end of life; the firm belief of a future state of punishment and perdition to ungodly men, is likewise as explicitly avowed, as almost in any part of the New Testament. 'He who a little while ago seemed to question the providence of God over the affairs of men, now exults in happy confidence of the divine mercy;—nothing doubting, but that he would ever continue to guide him on earth, till glory should crown him in heaven. Such are the blessed effects of "going into the sanctuary," and consulting "the lively oracles," in all our doubts, difficulties, and temptations.' (Horne.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

The distinction has been obvious in every age, betwixt mere professors of religion, and those who are inwardly sanctified by the Holy Spirit: and it has always been an undisputed maxim in the church, that the Lord is kind to his true people, whose hearts are upright with him. Yet appearances have often been against this truth; and Satan hath had his advantage in exciting the impatience and unbelief even of pious persons, and causing them to torment themselves and dishonour God by their surmises: so that many of them have had cause to say, "My feet were almost gone, my steps had well nigh slipped; for I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the “wicked.” It is indeed, at first sight, a mystery in Providence, that the wicked so often prosper, and the righteous are so much afflicted. Health, long life, affluence, and an easy death, are often granted to the basest of men. Thus their pride, ambition, covetousness, and sensuality are increased; they grow more daring in impiety and iniquity: and by their example and discourse widely diffuse contagion and misery around them: while their impunity emboldens them to infidelity, and they say, “How doth God know, and is there knowledge in the Most High?” The mischief which these prosperous infidels and scorners occasion in the world is indeed very great; many professed Christians are by them drawn into apostacy; and even believers are often much discouraged, so that at some times they are ready to think that their repentance, faith, love, zeal, watchfulness, and conscientiousness have been in vain. For being chastened from time to time, they are apt to call this being “plagued all the day long.” But though temptations may thus darken and perplex a true Christian, and very rebellious thoughts may be stirred up: yet there is a holy engrafted principle within, which will counteract them, prevent their effects, and at length gain the ascendancy: and when he has escaped the snare, he will be the better able to counsel and comfort his brethren.

V. 15—28.

Sometimes when the fire burns within, an unwillingness to grieve or stumble his fellow-Christians, or to gratify the malice of the wicked, imposes silence on the tempted believer: for he must perceive, on reflection, that if outward prosperity were of great importance, the generation of God’s children in every age have acted most imprudently, in enduring so many afflictions for the Lord’s sake. We shall, however, never get ground against such temptations by merely speculating; and shall rather find our minds perplexed with new difficulties and objections, till we bring the whole matter and weigh it in the balance of the sanctuary. But attention to the sacred Scriptures, and fervent prayer, will soon extricate us from these labyrinths: we shall then be led to look off from things seen and temporal to things unseen and eternal: and when we consider the end of wicked men, we shall be convinced of their folly and misery; and clearly perceive that they are no more to be envied, than a state criminal, bound in chains of gold till he be put to some tormenting death. We shall then see that their wealth and prosperity were given them in anger, as a punishment of their impiety and enmity against God; and that they were treasuring up wrath, until the time when they were to be cast down headlong

from their slippery pre-eminence into eternal destruction; of which in the mean-while they are often tortured with the apprehension. Thus their happiness is only a dream; speedily they will awake, and the enchantment will be dissolved, and they will too late perceive their own misery. If we have ever envied such ruinous prosperity, or complained of the salutary corrections of our heavenly Father; if our hearts have rebelled against his appointment: surely on reflection we must be ashamed of our folly and brutish stupidity, as well as of our perverseness and ingratitude. And indeed we do not gain a complete victory over the enemy, unless his buffetings prove the occasion of our deeper humiliation before God. (2 Cor. xii. 7.) Surely, that man hath no right or reason to complain, or to envy, who hath God for his Friend and Father, to provide for, comfort, and uphold him, to guide him here with his counsel, and then to receive him to eternal glory. Indeed heaven itself could not render us happy without his presence and love: much less could earth and all its possessions satisfy the desires of an immortal soul. And if the Lord is our Portion, we need desire no more besides him; for he is all-sufficient and everlasting. The world and all its glory vanisheth; our flesh and hearts will soon fail; but God will be the strength of our hearts, and our happiness for ever. By sin we are all indeed far off from God, in the temper of our minds and the state of our souls; and at this distance, misery is inevitable: but by the Gospel we are invited to draw nigh to him; and as nothing but preferring other portions and confidences to him and his salvation can prevent our happiness; so the ruin of such as refuse this gracious offer is most certain; and a profession of Christianity, if men go on in sin or return back to it, will increase their condemnation. May we then “choose that good part which can never be taken from us.” May we prefer those enduring riches, those holy pleasures, and that genuine honour, which God bestows on his people. May we draw near, and keep near, to Him by faith and prayer, and find it good to do so. That, putting our trust in the Lord, and declaring our experience of his love, patiently bearing our cross, and despising worldly objects; we may encourage our brethren to resist, and teach them by our counsel and example to overcome, these dangerous temptations of the enemy of our souls.

NOTES.

PSALM LXXIV. Asaph. This psalm seems so adapted to the case of the Jews during the Babylonish captivity, that if Asaph, who lived in the time of David, were the writer of it, he must have composed it by the Spirit of prophecy. But it is far more probable, that it was written by some other Asaph, who lived at the time of the captivity, or, as some think, by one of Asaph's descendants.

V. 1, 2. Israel as a nation was typically, (what true Christians are really,) the sheep of God's pasture, his purchased congregation and ransomed inheritance, whom he redeemed by desolating Egypt, and among whom he dwelt, by the ark, the symbol of his presence; which from the days of David to the captivity was stationed on mount Zion, and then was finally lost or destroyed. Both the ten tribes and the kingdom of Judah had given abundant cause for the hot displeasure of God; and even deserved to be cast off for ever: yet the pious remnant of the nation, remembering what the Lord had formerly done for their ancestors, and how he had repeatedly pardoned their rebellions, especially when they humbled themselves before him; knowing also that the promises and prophecies of the Messiah were not yet accomplished, and witnessing the insults of idolaters over the worshippers of the true God, were emboldened thus to plead, and as it were expostulate, with him, for seeming finally to cast off his people, and to retain his anger for ever. The church, under persecution or oppression, though deserving worse than all that is inflicted, may on similar grounds plead for deliverance.

V. 3. The idolatrous Chaldeans had wickedly burnt the temple, and left it to perpetual desolations; and God himself seemed to stand at a distance, and pay no regard to it: but the Psalmist called on him to come speedily, that he might survey and restore his ruined Sanctuary.—Some render the last clause, 'that thou mayest destroy every enemy which hath done evil in thy Sanctuary.'

V. 4. The Chaldeans, rushing into the temple, shouting for victory amidst the affrighted worshippers, and setting up their standards, or erecting trophies of their success, seem to be here described. Antiochus Epiphanes afterwards profaned the temple, and dispersed the worshippers, but he did not burn it. The prevalence of infidelity and the triumphs of heathen infidels, and antichristian persecutors and corrupters of Christianity, are events equally lamentable; and the proper directory for prayer on such occasions is here given.

V. 5, 6. 'It was heretofore thought an employment of much honour and merit in those men, who did cut down and square the timber-trees for the building of the holy Sanctuary. But now every man thinks himself to deserve most thanks, that can do most havock to thy holy place.' (Bp. Hall.) 'As a skilful person lifteth up the axe in the thick wood; so now men set themselves to work, to demolish the ornaments and timbers of the Sanctuary.' (Horne.) 'He that lifted up the axes upon the thick trees, was crowned as one that brought a thing to perfection: but now they break down, &c.' (Old Version.) The word rendered thick, not denoting the largeness of the trees, but the intricate density of the forest, may be supposed to be a figurative description of the complicated workmanship of the temple, and then the following will be the meaning: 'Each of them is accounted famous, according as he hath lifted up the axes on the curious workmanship, (of the temple.) Even now do they beat down the carved work with axes and hammers.' The eagerness of the destroyers, and the honour they acquired by the work of destruction, are evidently intended.

V. 8. The word rendered synagogues, is in the fourth verse translated congregations. It means, according to the context, either the stated seasons of assembling, the places in which the people met stately, or the congregations collected together at the solemn feasts, or the solemn feasts themselves. As it is doubtful whether synagogues, in the common sense of the word, had become general before the captivity, it is probable that the courts of the temple in which the people assembled were intended; and that the passage might be rendered, 'They have burned God's places of assembling even to the ground.' The Septuagint translates the clause, 'They have caused the feasts of the Lord to cease through the land.' (Notes, 2 Kings iv. 23. 2 Chr. xvii. 7-9.)

V. 9. The constant sacrifices on the altar, and the observance of the solemn feasts, were signs of the Lord's presence with his people, which ceased during the captivity: neither had they any miraculous interpositions in their favour. They had little encouragement from prophets, were destitute of prudent counsellors, and could not well determine when these calamities should cease. Jeremiah indeed prophesied in Jerusalem before, and in Egypt after the destruction of the temple; and Ezekiel and Daniel in Babylon: yet they were often silent for a good while together, and the case of the pious Jews was very discouraging and their prospect gloomy. The predictions, likewise, of all these prophets, after the destruction of Jerusalem, related chiefly to other nations and to distant periods: and though Daniel, and doubtless many others, understood from Jeremiah's predictions, when to expect some favourable crisis; yet it is evident that even these eminent persons had considerable difficulty in knowing what that crisis would be, and when the nation would be restored to prosperity. Consequently the pious remnant dispersed in distant places must in general have been greatly at a loss on these subjects, and have deeply regretted the want of prophets, bringing them explicit and encouraging messages from God, suited to their distressed condition.—The passage, however, is still more aptly descriptive of the state of the Jews in their present long continued dispersion: and we may well suppose, that when numbers of that nation shall be led to inquire, on what account they have been left in captivity and oppression, for a term of years so vastly exceeding the duration of the Babylonish captivity, without priest, prophet, or token for good, or indication how long it will be before they are restored; this psalm will direct or even express their complaints and devotions. It may also suit the state of the Christian church, under the tyranny of antichrist, the entire termination of which cannot yet be precisely ascertained.

V. 10, 11. The reproaches and blasphemies which insulting idolaters incessantly poured out against God and his worshippers, seem to have more grieved these supplicants, than their own distresses; and this was their principal plea in prayer. The last clause is literally, "Out of thy bosom; and consume them." A highly figurative expression.

V. 12. 'Why should we despair of it, since the great God, whom they deride, has many ages ago undertaken the government and protection of us,' (the nation of Israel,) 'working for us such deliverances in this land, which now lies waste, as astonished all the world?' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 13-17. Pharaoh, as the great Leviathan, (Notes, Job xli.) and his captains and soldiers as sea monsters of inferior size, were ready to devour Israel in the Red Sea; but were themselves entirely destroyed: and the people were enriched and armed by the spoils of their enemies, as well as encouraged for their march through the wilderness. There the rock was cleft to give them water, and then Jordan's flood was dried up to open their passage into Canaan. These had been the tokens of JEHOVAH's care of them and his power displayed in their behalf: and the appointment of the succession of night and day, and of summer and winter, through all the borders of the earth, by Israel's God, was a most encouraging demonstration of his omnipotence; and an emblem of the favourable change which the afflicted Jews hoped he would effect in their circumstances. The word rendered the people inhabiting the wilderness, is in some places used for the wild beasts which live in deserts; and the clause may mean, that the bodies of Pharaoh and his captains, being thrown on shore, were devoured by beasts of prey.

V. 19. The word, rendered first multitude and then congregation, signifies living, or a living creature. It is often translated beast, or collectively beasts: but in many places it evidently means a living multitude. Some read this verse in connexion with the foregoing, 'O deliver not the life of thy turtle into the hand of that multitude,' namely, the multitude of the foolish people that blasphemed God.—The church, as faithful and loving, pure and harmless, destitute and defenceless, and silently mourning under the displeasure and at the absence of her Beloved, is described under this beautiful image. Surely the Lord valued his turtle-dove too much, to leave her to be devoured by the hawks and eagles which surrounded her.

V. 20. Though Israel was unworthy of God's regard, and had broken their national covenant: yet even that covenant gave intimation of returning favour to the nation, when brought to confess their sins and seek humbly to God, even from the ends of the earth; and of a reinstatement in Canaan, after their dispersions. And the covenant with Abraham and his seed, and that with David and his Ref.*) The coming of the promised Messiah from that race was thus unalterably secured: and how should the dark places of the earth, which were filled with the habitations of cruelty, be enlightened and converted, or the worship of God be at all maintained, if Israel were destroyed before the coming of that Redeemer, who was to be a "Light to the Gentiles," and the Glory of his people Israel?" "All places where thy word shineth not, there reigneth tyranny and ambition:" what a different view does this verse give us of those countries where the oracles of God are not known, to that which some travellers and speculators draw of them! But the view here given is found on examination to accord with the real state of things all over the earth; and should stimulate Christians to exert themselves in endeavouring to send the light of truth to the regions of darkness, and the habitations of cruelty.

V. 21, 22. "The oppressed shall not return ashamed; the poor and needy shall praise thy name: Arise, O LORD, &c." "It is thy own cause, as well as ours, therefore, though thou waitest to be called on by us; yet thou wilt certainly and effectually plead it in due time."

V. 23. "While speaking, she seems to hear the tumultuous clamours of the approaching enemy growing every minute louder, and we leave the turtle-dove, without the divine assistance, ready to sink into the talons of the rapacious eagle." (Horne.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Churches and nations professing true religion, have often provoked God finally to cast them off; so that he would no longer acknowledge them as his flock or inheritance. But the sheep whom he hath purchased and brought into his pasture, and made to answer in character to this instructive emblem, and in whom he dwelleth by his Spirit, shall never be thus cast off. Yet the rod of his fatherly correction may sometimes be mistaken for the sword of his vengeance; the purification of his church, by the destruction or dispersion of degenerate professors, may make his people think that he intends to make a full end with them; and the methods used for the mortification of the lusts of believers sometimes seem to threaten the destruction of their souls. But God will never utterly forsake any individual who turneth to him when he smiteth, by penitent faith; or any church, whilst there is a considerable remnant of such as wrestle with him in fervent prayer to spare and deliver them: nor can the gates of hell prevail against his cause. Infidels, persecutors, and heretics, who do wickedly in God's sanctuary, may make grievous desolations; they may erect their trophies, and glory in the mischief they have devised; they may run down the truth, silence faithful ministers, shut up places of worship, and persecute Christians; and they may say in their hearts, Let us destroy them and their religion together. In the mystery of Providence they may for a time prosper in these attempts: and the oppressed servants of God may complain, that they see no tokens of deliverance, have none to encourage or counsel them, and cannot tell how long these calamities will last. But this remnant is the seed of a future harvest: they pray with fervent zeal for the glory of God, that he would not withdraw his hand, or delay his powerful interposition; but that he would pluck his right hand out of his bosom, to defend the cause of his people, and to vindicate his own insulted honour. Such prayers have hitherto prevailed, and the despised church has survived numbers of those assailants who once triumphed over her, but are now perished as the dung of the earth. Indeed we cannot be too confident that the cause of God will prevail: we are allowed to expostulate with him freely, according to our feelings, when we are grieved to hear his name blasphemed and his truth reviled: and every former mercy to his church constitutes a cogent argument, why he should again interpose to perfect what he hath so gloriously begun. The triumph of Christ over Satan, by his crucifixion and resurrection, and the consequent success of his gospel among the Gentiles, may be urged as a far greater display of his power and mercy, than any of the miracles wrought for the deliverance of Israel. If this God, who thus wrought salvation in the midst of the earth, be our King whom we willingly obey, he will make every assault of Satan, that great leviathan, and of all his progeny, to be profitable to our souls. If we drink of those waters which flow from our smitten Rock, even the sanctifying influences of the Spirit of Christ, he will also divide Jordan's flood before us, that we may pass comfortably from this wilderness to the inheritance prepared for us. The vicissitudes of day and night, summer and winter, (through the changing of our situation in respect of the sun, the fountain of light which God hath prepared,) are emblematic of those changes in our circumstances and experiences which must take place on earth; and should remind us neither to be secure nor to despond. But in the world above we shall have no more changes: "our Sun shall no more go down, and the days of our mourning will be ended." Whilst in faith, and hope, and patience, we wait for this completion of our personal felicity; we may also confidently expect a glorious event of all the oppressions, persecutions, and corruptions, which have hitherto harassed the Christian church. We may indeed well inquire of the Lord, with astonishment, How long he will permit his adversaries to blaspheme his name? But it shall not be for ever: and the folly of such as reproach him and his servants, will at length be as visible to all men as it now is to the remnant of despised believers. The true church is as amiable and pleasant to the Lord as a turtle-dove, though poor and despicable in the world's estimation. His covenant with the Redeemer engages for more extensive blessings than have yet been vouchsafed. Ere long the Jews shall be

This time approaches: let us then call upon our God to have respect unto his covenant; to enlighten all the dark nations of the earth, which are filled with cruelty and wickedness; and to rescue his people from shame and dishonour, that the poor and needy may praise his name. Let us call upon him to arise and plead his own cause, and to silence effectually and finally the boastings and clamours of his enemies which increase continually. This is our duty and privilege; and all the prayers, offered in this behalf, will at length terminate in loud acclamations of praise and thanksgiving.

NOTES.

PSALM LXXV. Title. If Asaph wrote this psalm, it is probable, that he did it by the desire of David upon his accession to the throne over all Israel: and the psalm seems well suited to that occasion. Some however think, that another Asaph wrote it, in the days of Hezekiah.

V. 1. Thy name, &c. JEHOVAH exercising all the perfections of his glorious name, or character, was evidently nigh unto his people; as appeared by his wondrous works for them, which excited their fervent gratitude.

V. 2. The foregoing verse is the language of the congregation; this, and those which follow, of a single person, even of a ruler. Some suppose, that the Lord himself is the speaker; who declares, that when his appointed time came, he would execute judgment in righteousness. (Marg. reading, Note lxxiv. 8.) But others think that David, as the type of Christ, engages to rule in equity when placed over the congregation of the Lord.

V. 3. The land of Israel was reduced to great distraction towards the close of Saul's reign; every thing in church and state was unhinged; and the defeat at Gilboa, with the intestine divisions which followed, increased the confusion: but David had been anointed by God's command to uphold and establish the estate of Israel. Even before his accession, he had been the chief stay of his country; and when the whole nation willingly submitted to his government, he soon brought their affairs to a happy settlement.

V. 4. The words rendered fools, and deal not foolishly, seem properly to denote mad persons, and acting in an insatuated manner. Saul of Tarsus was exceedingly mad against the church of Christ; but when he came to himself, and was endued abundantly with heavenly wisdom, men began to think him mad.

V. 5. (Marg. Ref.) The last clause may be rendered, "Ye will speak with a stiff neck," or, perhaps "Will ye, &c.?"

V. 6, 7. God, the supreme Judge, had put down Saul's family, and appointed David to the throne: and his promotion had come from no other quarter or cause. It would be madness therefore to oppose any longer the sovereign appointment of JEHOVAH. (Notes, Psalm ii.)

V. 8. Heavenly blessings are in Scripture represented by a cup full of wholesome exhilarating wine: but the wrath of God is represented by a cup of wine mingled with ingredients of that kind which tend to produce fear, distress, and despondency; and if drunk to excess, horror, insatiation, anguish, and despair. From this cup the Lord dispenseth as he pleaseth to sinners in this world: and even his people drink some of the purer wine contained in it, when chastened in his fatherly displeasure: but the dregs of it will be the portion of all the impenitent hereafter, who will wring them out, and drink them, to all eternity.

V. 10. Before David came to the throne, he warned the wicked not to proceed in their evil courses: but he purposed, now that he had acquired authority, effectually to break the power of triumphant wickedness, and to encourage and prefer the righteous; as an apt representative of that righteous King whom he typified.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The whole church, militant and triumphant, unite in thanksgivings to God for exalting the Redeemer to his mediatorial throne; and this wonderful dispensation especially declareth his presence with his people. Without Him the earth and all its inhabitants would rush impetuously into universal confusion, impiety, iniquity, and ruin: he alone bears up the pillars of it; and all the present hopes and future happiness of any of the human race, spring from the work and authority of the incarnate Son of God. Having received his congregation of redeemed sinners, and the kingdom over all for their sake, he judges uprightly: and by his ministers he warns such as proudly rebel and exalt themselves against him, not to deal foolishly, or to harden their hearts to their own destruction. That God, who exalted the Redeemer to his throne, is the Fountain of honour, as well as the Judge of all: none can prosper who do not submit to him; He will account all to be his enemies who will not have his beloved Son to be their Lord and Saviour; and such must for ever drink of the cup of his dreadful vengeance. But whilst all the horns of the wicked shall be cut off, and their ruin completed, his church of believers shall inherit the throne of glory. Let sinners then submit to him: let believers rejoice in and obey him: and let Christian magistrates remember their obligations to copy him, from whom they have their authority; that they may judge righteously, maintain the cause of piety, crush the haughty oppressor, and protect, and advance, and exalt the righteous. And let the people recollect from whom their rulers have their authority; that they “may be subject not only for wrath, “but also for conscience sake.”

NOTES.

PSALM LXXVI. Title. The Septuagint adds to this title against the Assyrian. The deliverance from Sennacherib indeed seems to have been celebrated in this psalm.

V. 1. In Judah and Israel God was known and worshipped, and his name was honoured; but in no other part of the world, except as Jews or Israelites were dispersed through other nations. Indeed to this day, all the genuine knowledge of the one living and true God which is found on earth, may be traced back to writers and teachers of this despised nation. Where neither they nor their writings have come, God is still unknown; and if there be any religion, it is idolatry. This assertion admits of no exception or qualification!

V. 2. Salem here evidently means Jerusalem. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. The enemies of Judah had marched to besiege Jerusalem with every kind of warlike preparation: but by the power of God, their formidable apparatus became entirely useless, and they were unable to join battle with them.

V. 4. Zion, the chosen residence of JEHOVAH, was vastly more glorious and excellent than Babylon, or Nineveh; and the kingdom of Judah than those successively renowned monarchies, which contended with each other, to the destruction of the human species, as the beasts of prey on the mountains devour the feebler animals. Their successes in these destructive contests for power, were deemed their glory and excellency: but the church, beloved and protected by the Lord, and devoted to his service, had a glory and excellency of a nobler kind.

V. 5, 6. These verses fix the date of this psalm to the time of the destruction of Sennacherib's army before Jerusalem. Then, his stout-hearted captains and soldiers were suddenly deprived of life; and so far from being able to destroy Jerusalem, as they had boasted they would, they could make no more resistance to the power of the destroying angel, than if their hands had been cut off: for at the rebuke of that God whom they had blasphemed, they who rode in chariots and on horses, as well as the common soldiers, were cast into a dead sleep. They went to sleep in the evening as in security; but they awoke no more in this world: and thus they were left to be plundered by those whom they came to plunder.

12 ^b He shall cut off the spirit of princes: he is ^c terrible to the kings of the earth.

V. 8, 9. Hezekiah referred his cause to God by fervent prayer; who by the prophet Isaiah gave judgment from heaven against the blasphemous invaders: and then the angel carried the sentence into execution. Thus the Lord saved his humble and afflicted people throughout the land; and the nations of the earth, being intimidated, silently desisted from their designs of destroying or enslaving them.

V. 10. The rage and malice of the most mighty persecutors and tyrants were always rendered subservient to the display of the Lord's glory, and to the good of his people. And if they designed any thing of contrary tendency, he failed not to restrain or destroy them. This he had exemplified in the case of Sennacherib, who, being "ordained for correction, and sent against an hypocritical nation," was successful in his undertakings till he had fulfilled the part of the divine counsel which had been allotted him; but when he attempted to exceed his commission, he was suddenly and effectually restrained from proceeding any further. And this must be considered merely as a specimen of the divine conduct in all similar cases. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11, 12. As the Lord had shown himself terrible to the kings of the earth, by intimidating the most courageous, and crushing the most powerful and haughty; so he ought to be worshipped with reverence and awe by all that approached him: and his late interposition in behalf of his people, should excite them to pay the vows which they made in the day of their distress, and to accompany their prayers with vows on all similar occasions; being liberal as well as fervent in expressing their gratitude to their gracious Benefactor.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

God is more fully known, in the harmony of his attributes, under the Christian dispensation, than he was in Judah: and his glory is greater, as dwelling in human nature and in the hearts of his people, than it was formerly, when he had his tabernacle on mount Zion, and was the Protector of Jerusalem. In vain do Satan and his servants wage implacable war, with tremendous preparations against the church: the Lord hath often confounded their devices, marred their weapons of war, and destroyed their armies. His peaceful, harmless, and holy people have frequently been shown to be formidable by their prayers, as well as more honourable and excellent, than the most successful scourges of mankind: and happy is that nation, which is well fortified with these bulwarks: for what is valour, strength, or numbers against the Almighty? At his rebuke they tremble, stumble, and are not! He "alone is to be feared: for who may stand in his sight when once he is angry?" Yet puny mortals dare madly through their whole lives to defy the vengeance of that God, whose angel in one night destroyed a hundred and eighty-five thousand men! But if temporal judgments excite such consternation, what will be the case when the Lord shall arise to judgment at the last day! Happy they who are now meek and "poor in spirit," who trust in his mercy and submit to his will, who vow allegiance to him, and dedicate their all to his service. Man may despise or be enraged at them, and the powers of darkness may excite storms around them: but all shall turn to the glory of God in their salvation: and when their enemies attempt any thing, which would do them real harm, God will restrain this remainder of their wrath. Let us then seek his favour as our portion; and commit all our concerns to his wise, powerful, and gracious care; who can dispirit or destroy the most courageous and mighty, and is terrible to the ungodly kings of the earth.

NOTES.

PSALM LXXVII. Title. 'A Psalm composed by Asaph, and sent by him to that Song-master, who was 'over the children of Jeduthun.' (Bp. Patrick.) It is, however, uncertain, when the psalm was written, and whether it refers to the personal trials of the Psalmist, or to public calamities, or to both combined. Some conjecture that it was composed as expressive of Hezekiah's feelings, during his sickness; and others that it was written during the captivity: but as no reference is made to any of God's dealings with Israel subsequent to their deliverance out of Egypt, it seems more likely that it was written as early as the time of David, and by that Asaph who was his contemporary.

V. 1. The abruptness of the original is very expressive of the agitation of mind, which the Psalmist had experienced. "My voice unto God, and I cried; my voice unto God, and he gave ear unto me." Till his prayer received a gracious answer, this agitation of mind continued, and he proceeds to describe it, and to show how he struggled against impatience and unbelief.

V. 2. Sore. According to this translation, the Psalmist represents his affliction, whatever it was, as a wound which bled or ran incessantly, wasting his strength during the night, whilst others were recruiting theirs by sleep. But the original word is my hand; and it is probable the following is a just paraphrase of the passage. "In the day of 'my distress' 'I have restlessly implored help from the 'LORD. In the night, when men are wont to bury their 'troubles in sleep, I have with unwearied diligence, spread out my hands unto him; resolving to admit of no consolation, till I had obtained a gracious answer.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 3. "I remembered God, and was greatly disturbed in mind; I meditated, and my spirit was overwhelmed." — "He sheweth that we must patiently abide, although God 'deliver us not out of our troubles at the first cry.' The Psalmist describes his inward perturbation by a word expressive of the tumult of the waves in a storm, or that of an enraged disorderly multitude. It is probable that conscious guilt gave Satan the occasion of exciting in him dismay and distress, when he reflected on the divine perfections; and that impatience and despondency thus combined in rendering his soul like the troubled sea: insomuch that the thoughts of the Lord's mercy and truth, his former kindnesses, and the comfort he had experienced in religion on other occasions; instead of giving him encouragement, served to enhance his disquietude, now that God hid his face from him, and seemed to have become his enemy.

V. 4. Our Lord was kept watching during that dreadful night, in which being "sore amazed and very heavy," he said, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful even unto death;" just before he stood silent in the presence of Caiaphas, Herod, and Pilate: and the language in this part of the psalm is so emphatical, that the attentive reader can hardly fail to recollect that of Christ during the depth of his humiliation.

V. 5—12. In these verses the Psalmist describes his inward struggle against unbelief and despair. In the depth of his distress he applied his mind to meditate on ancient times, when God had wonderfully interposed in behalf of his people, and shown himself most ready to pardon their sins, compassionate their sorrows, and hear their prayers. He also determined to recollect his own experience of such mercies and deliverances as had led him to spend a part of the night in singing praises to God: and likewise to call himself to strict account, and diligently to examine and inquire, 'both the causes why he was chastened, and 'when his sorrows should have an end.' He was however tempted to think that God had cast him off for ever, and would show him no more favour. 'But,' says he, 'Can this 'be? Can he who was known to delight in mercy cease to be 'merciful? Will he break his own promise? Is he so angry, 'as no more to pardon the penitent and pity the miserable? 'This cannot be. I will reject with abhorrence the disho- 'nourable thought. It is the disease and weakness of my 'soul, that I ever harboured it. Whatever appearances may 'be, God continues merciful and faithful, ready to forgive, 'and plenteous in goodness and compassion. "The years 'of the hand of the Most High;" the time when he lifted up 'his right hand to deliver his people, prove this; I will there- 'fore fix my attention on those ancient works of БЖОВАН, 'and thus endeavour to encourage my desponding heart, and 'to calm my conflicting passions.' Most expositors seem to think that the Psalmist's alarm and distress were occasioned by public calamities, in great measure at least. But there is no intimation of this; and personal trials and temptations might be so great and complicated, as to excite the sharp conflict which he so affectingly describes.

V. 13. The Psalmist's faith and grace now obtain the ascendancy over his rebellious will, his unbelief, and his temptations; and he is satisfied, that the way of God, (or the exercise of his sovereign authority, over the world, the church, and every individual,) is under the direction of infinite wisdom, and ordered in perfect justice, truth, and goodness. It is in holiness; and so consists with his testimonies, his promises, and his covenant. It is in the sanctuary; and being beyond the reach of man's wisdom, cannot be understood, except by those who enter into the sanctuary, and weigh all things in the balances of the sanctuary. For his unrivalled, his infinite greatness seems to cloud the glory of his justice and goodness, to the sinful children of Adam.

V. 14, 15. 'Thou art the mighty God, who canst do ¹ miracles, as easily as the most ordinary works : having ² delivered thy people descended from Jacob, and miraculously preserved by Joseph, from Egyptian bondage.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 16-18. The waters, even to the bottom of the Red Sea, are here most poetically described, as affrighted, and as rendered sensible of the presence of God with Israel, and as obedient to his will ; nay, all nature is represented as put into consternation and violent commotion before him. It is probable that the destruction of the Egyptians was attended by most tremendous and destructive tempests, thunders, lightnings, and earthquakes.

V. 19, 20. All the dispensations of God towards his people are in mercy : but, like Israel's passage through the Red Sea, they are often attended with circumstances of dismay. His ways of dealing with them can no more be traced, than the path of Israel, when he led them as a flock, through the Red Sea ; and they are called to trust in him, whilst he conducts them by a way with which they are wholly unacquainted, and which is displeasing and discouraging to the flesh. By these meditations the Psalmist at length found his heart encouraged ; and therefore he left them upon record for the benefit of posterity.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In this world our praises are often interrupted by complaints. Sin, temptation, affliction, the calamities of the church, and the miseries of the world, must cause us to "groan, being burdened." When the heart is greatly pained, nature expresses that pain by the voice : but grace will teach us to send our cries to heaven with earnest importunity for relief. Yet sometimes even they who are instant in prayer, may be tempted to despond, and to overlook the sources of comfort which are pointed out to them ; and a deep sense of their own unworthiness may afford Satan an opportunity of suggesting such gloomy apprehensions, that even thoughts of God may increase their disquietude and horror. Thus the eyes may be holden from sleep, and the mouth may be closed, whilst sorrows too big for utterance distend and distract the heart. But this will not last very long with the upright believer : the troubled fountain will work itself clear again ; and even the recollection of former times of more joyful experience, though it cause his wounds to bleed afresh, will often suggest a hint, or inspire a hope, tending to his relief. It is however always good to commune with our own hearts ; and to make diligent search, concerning the cause, the intention, and the remedy of our distresses ; especially, that we may ascertain, whether, notwithstanding our unworthiness, we be indeed truly humbled believers. And if the enemy could lead us to suspect that the "Lord will cast ¹ off his people for ever," and be no more favourable to them, we should reject the injurious suggestion with horror and indignation. What ! Will God no more favour those who have walked with him, and are now mourning after him ? Hath his everlasting mercy come to an end ? Has his faithful promise failed ? Hath God forgotten to be gracious, and in anger shut up his tender mercy ? And will he dishonour himself, by leaving the humble, penitent, praying soul to perish ? It is our infirmity, for which we should rebuke ourselves, if we have for a moment entertained such thoughts : and we should without delay turn our minds to more encouraging meditations. The years of ancient times, and the Lord's wonders for his people of old, form proper subjects for our contemplation and discourse on such occasions ; as they are illustrious evidences of his power, and mercy, and love to his church. But the mysteries of redeeming love, and the great events which attended the Saviour's sufferings and exaltation to his glorious throne, should be our favourite theme. There all the divine perfections are displayed ; and the sinner, who understands and believes the testimony of Scripture on this subject, will be encouraged to expect every thing from the power, truth, and love of that God, who "spared not his own Son, but ² delivered him up for us all, that with him he might ³ freely give us all things." It is true, that the Lord's way is in the sea, but it is also in the sanctuary : he leads his people through deep waters of affliction or temptation ; but he goes with them, and brings them forth, when he hath thus destroyed their enemies. We cannot trace his footsteps, nor understand the reasons of his dispensations : but we are called to believe that he will guide us by his counsel ; and that those things, which we are tempted to ascribe to his having "forgotten to be gracious," are the result of his unsearchable wisdom choosing for us, in order to our good, what we should never have chosen for ourselves. If he see proper, he can soon raise up such instruments as Moses and Aaron, to lead his people, like a flock, through intervening seas and deserts, to their inheritance : and if the under shepherds neglect their charge, he

NOTES.

PSALM LXXVIII. V. 1. The word rendered law, in this connexion, evidently means the doctrine, or the instruction, which the Psalmist was divinely inspired to set before the people. It is probable that Asaph wrote this psalm some years after the death of David.

V. 2. The Evangelist says that this was fulfilled, when Christ spake to the people in parables; (Marg. Ref.) Yet the psalm contains nothing but a plain narrative of facts, without any thing of parable or riddle in it; except as the history of Israel, like the parables of Christ, was a picture or similitude of heavenly things; and these records would remain, in this respect, dark sayings to those who understood not the typical meaning of them.

V. 3—8. The Israelites were frequently and earnestly instructed to make their children, by every means, familiarly acquainted with the works and commandments of God: and as the Psalmist and his contemporaries had derived the benefit of this most useful information from their ancestors, he was determined, and aimed to induce others also, to deliver down the same to the rising race, and through them to the next generation, and thus successively to the end of time: as this was the proper method of bringing them to trust in God and obey him; to imitate the faith and holiness of their pious ancestors; and to take warning not to copy the rebellion, unbelief, and ungodliness of such as had brought the judgments of God upon them by their sins. The word testimony is used for the ark, and for the law written on tables of stone put within the ark, and covered with the mercy-seat. This testified the Lord's gracious presence with his people, and seemed to point out to them both the way of access and acceptance, and the standard or rule of their duty. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9, 10. Nothing is recorded in the history of Israel, concerning the cowardice of the Ephraimites, as distinct from that of the other tribes: some therefore think, that “the children of Ephraim” are put by a figure of speech, for the nation in general. Others suppose, that this tribe greatly influenced their brethren, when they refused to go up and possess the land, at the express command of God, who promised to fight for them: and then, after the sentence of exclusion was irrevocably passed, they armed themselves, and presumptuously would go up, contrary to the warning of God by Moses; but when the Amorites came out against them, they fled, and were chased like bees to Hormah. But the passage may relate to the defeat of Israel by the Philistines, when the ark of God was taken.—Shiloh, which was then desolated, was situated in the lot of Ephraim: and perhaps the men of that tribe, led on the battle; but giving way, their misconduct brought on a general defeat. In either case, the cowardice of the people was the effect of their unbelief and disobedience. They answered not the expectations formed of them; "they kept not the covenant of God, and refused to walk in his law."

V. 12. The reader must once for all be referred to the notes, &c. upon the parts of the preceding history, pointed out in the margin, in which all the events here recapitulated have been fully considered. This poetical abstract would greatly assist the people in becoming acquainted with their most instructive history, and preserving a ready remembrance of it.—These miracles were wrought in the most public manner, near Zoan, a principal city of Egypt, in which it seems Pharaoh kept his court.

V. 13-16. These verses are read in some versions in the pluperfect tense. "He had divided, &c." He had wrought these miracles for Israel, before those rebellions which the Psalmist was enumerating; and this rendered their unbelief and disobedience the more inexcusable.—Two rocks were smitten in the wilderness. (Notes, Ex. xvii. Num. xx.)—"Let us," saith Bishop Taylor, by the aids of memory and fancy, consider the children of Israel in the wilderness, "in a barren and dry land where no water was," marching in dust and fire, not wet with the dew of heaven, but wholly without moisture, save only what dropped from their brows:—suppose, I say, these thirsty souls, hearing Moses promise that he would smite the rock, and that a river should break forth from thence: observe how presently they run to the foot of the springing stone, thrust forth their heads and tongues to meet the water, impatient of delay, crying out that the water did not move, like light, all at once: then suppose the pleasure of their drink, the insatiableness of their desire—they took in as much as they could, and they desired much more. This was their sacrament, and this their manner of receiving it. And if that water was a type of our sacrament, or a sacrament of the same secret blessing, then is their thirst a signification of our duty.

V. 17-31. (Notes, &c. Num. xi.) Sometime after the manna and the water from the rock had been vouchsafed, the people began again to murmur and rebel against God; and some of them were consumed by lightning; "and yet for all this his anger was not turned away," because they murmured still more. The table that they insolently required was not the manna, for that had been sent before the water from the rock; and they loathed and despised it as light bread: but they wanted such provisions as the inhabitants of cultivated countries live upon, and these they thought God could not provide in the desert.

z Num. xiv. xvi. 32 ¶ For all this ^a they sinned still, and ^a believed not for his wondrous works.

33 Therefore ^b their days did he consume in vanity, and ^c their years in trouble.

34 ^d When he slew them, then they sought him: and they returned and inquired early after God.

35 And ^e they remembered that ^f God was their Rock, and the high God ^g their Redeemer.

36 Nevertheless ^h they did flatter him with their mouth, and ⁱ they lied unto him with their tongues.

37 For ^k their heart was not right with him, neither were they ^l steadfast in his covenant.

38 But ^m he, being full of compassion, forgave their iniquity, and destroyed them not: yea, ⁿ many a time turned he his anger away, and did not stir up all his wrath.

39 For ^o he remembered that they were but flesh; ^p a wind that passeth away; and cometh not again.

40 ^q How oft did they ^r provoke him in the wilderness, and ^s grieve him in the desert!

41 Yea, they turned back and tempted God, and limited the Holy One of Israel.

42 They ^t remembered not his hand, nor ^u the day when he delivered them from ^v the enemy.

43 How ^w he had ^x wrought his signs in Egypt, and his ^y wonders in the field of Zoan;

44 And had ^z turned their rivers into blood; and their floods, that they could not drink.

45 He ^a sent divers sorts of flies among them, which devoured them; and ^b frogs, which destroyed them.

Perhaps they endeavoured to persuade themselves, that the manna and the water from the rock, were supplied from natural resources; and only directed or regulated in a supernatural manner by JEHOVAH's power: but they supposed it to be impossible even for Him to furnish bread and flesh to so vast a multitude. This conclusion, after all the works of God which they had witnessed, and his special favours and express promises to them, was exceedingly provoking: he therefore determined to vindicate the honour of his own name, by showing that he was able to feed, as well as to feed them, in the wilderness: and then, amidst their excessive indulgence, to punish their unbelief and rebellion, by cutting off the most powerful, healthy, and luxurious among them. (Notes, Num. xi.) Manna, descending from the clouds, is here called the corn of heaven, and angel's food, or the bread of the Mighty; perhaps because it rendered the people healthy, and vigorous for their marches and wars. But it typified "that Bread which came down from heaven, and giveth life to the world;" by which man is brought to feed on angels' food, and to participate their felicity.

V. 32, 33. Here that instance of unbelief and rebellion, which provoked God to exclude the whole generation from the promised land, is peculiarly adverted to: as for that sin, they were condemned to die in the wilderness, without ever enjoying or witnessing the comforts of a cultivated country, a settled abode, and a competent regular provision. Their lives, even more than those of other men, were indeed spent in vanity; and as scarcely any of that vast multitude had arrived at the age of sixty, when their wanderings were ended, ("for indeed the hand of the LORD was against them to consume them;") it might well be said, according to the original, "their years" were consumed "in an hurry." (Notes, &c. Num. xiv.) 'Though they travelled up and down, very long and very ' much, yet it was to no purpose; for they were never the ' nearer their journey's end.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 34. 'Who, that hath been conversant in the house ' of mourning, and about the bed of sickness, but must ' have seen frequent instances of a temporary and deceit- ' ful repentance?' (Horne.)

V. 35. Redeemer. That is, from Egyptian bondage; for the bulk of the people understood not that spiritual redemption which was typified by that transaction.

V. 36, 37. 'Such was their hypocrisy, that they sought ' God for fear of punishment, though in their heart they ' loved him not.—Whatsoever cometh not from the pure ' fountain of the heart is hypocrisy.'

V. 38. 'Had God stirred up all his wrath, the Israel- ' ites must have been exterminated in the wilderness. But ' then the promises made to Abraham, &c. must have ' failed. Therefore they were not destroyed; judgment ' was executed from time to time upon offenders; but the ' nation subsisted, till the Seed came to whom the promise ' was made. Nay, the race is yet marvellously preserved, ' and we trust in mercy.' (Horne.)

V. 39. (Marg. Ref.) The frailty of man, as incapable of enduring the wrath of God, is here emphatically described, as well as the divine compassion for such feeble worms: but it is not to be supposed, nor can the language be fairly interpreted to mean, that God considers man's sinful nature as a palliation of his actual rebellions: yet the passage is often thus explained.

V. 41. Limited, &c. The Israelites did not believe that God could and would destroy the Anakims before them, and give them the land of Canaan.

the Egyptians, to bite, and sting, and harass them; and that in many instances their bite or sting was mortal. Indeed the word rendered divers sorts of flies, is so general, that even devouring wild beasts may be meant by it as well as insects and reptiles.

V. 49. Perhaps evil angels terrified the Egyptians, during the plague of darkness: they were, however, permitted to deceive and harden them to their destruction. 'A fire kindled of itself very dreadful; they were scared with beasts that passed by, and hissing of serpents; they were vexed with monstrous apparitions, so that they fainted and died for fear; while over them was spread a heavy night, an image of that darkness which should receive them.' (Book of Wisdom.) Such were the traditions of the Jews on this subject, when that apocryphal book was written.

V. 50. Made a way. The preceding miracles and judgments, during which the long suffering of God had given the Egyptians space for repentance, had only proved an occasion to them of filling up the measure of their sins; and this made way for the execution of his vengeance.

V. 54. Purchased. Or, claimed, and taken possession of, for the inheritance of his chosen people. The whole land of Canaan seems to have been intended. Notwithstanding Israel's multiplied rebellions, and the terrible judgments inflicted on them, mercy at last prevailed, and the nation enjoyed the promised inheritance.

V. 56-60. The history of Israel, from the death of Joshua, to that of Eli, forms the best comment on these verses. (Marg. Ref.) The continually repeated apostacies of the Israelites to idolatry rendered them like a deceitful bow, that never sends the arrows to the mark, but always disappoints the archer's expectations.

V. 61. Strength, &c. That is, The ark, the symbol of JEHOVAH's protecting presence with his people, and which, as typifying the harmonious display of his perfections in the salvation of Christ, is also called his glory, or his beauty.

V. 63. The wrath of God gave up the army of Israel into the hands of the Philistines to be consumed as by fire. Thus their young men perished, their enemies triumphed, and their virgins were not praised, (according to the custom of commending them in songs, when they were married.) Either they remained single; or in a time of public calamity, amidst the insulting oppressions of their enemies, all the customary tokens of joy were omitted.

V. 64. The wife of Phinehas, hearing of his death, soon expired, and so did not survive to lament her loss: others, perhaps, had been previously taken off; or they were made captives, and dared not lament, lest they should enrage their conquerors.

V. 65, 66. While the Philistines were inflicting deserved punishment on the Israelites, the Lord seemed like one asleep, and as not regarding either his people, or even "the Ark of his strength:" but when their resentment or ambition had accomplished his purposes, he suddenly and effectually interposed to rebuke the impious triumphs of the idolaters, and to put them and their idol to a perpetual shame: even as a mighty man of valour would rest, or refresh himself, notwithstanding the advance of the enemy, till the moment arrived for executing his own plan; and then he would burst forth on them with unexpected and irresistible fury. By the emerods, the Lord disgraced as well as discomfited the Philistines; and he constrained them to send back the ark; and by the golden images of the emerods and of the mice that marred the land, they were led to publish and perpetuate their own disgrace.

V. 69. This verse shows that the psalm was written after the building of the temple, and consequently not sooner than eleven or twelve years after the death of David: for the language cannot suit the tabernacle he placed on mount Zion; as that was soon to be superseded by a magnificent temple, which was at length erected so strong, that it appeared likely to stand as long as the earth endured. It was, however, destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar; and though Zion continued the centre of JEHOVAH's worship, till the coming of Christ; yet it has now been trodden under foot of the Gentiles for above seventeen hundred years.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-11.

The instructions of the sacred word are dark sayings to the inattentive and self-confident: and yet they are very plain to the humble, diligent, and obedient inquirer, who earnestly prays for the teaching of the Holy Spirit, and reduces to practice, and realizes in his experience, what he learns from thence. The truths, precepts, and works of God, which have been recorded and transmitted to us by our progenitors, form a sacred deposit, which we must hand down to posterity: "Showing to the generation to come the praises of the Lord, and his strength, and his wonderful works that he hath done; that they too should arise, and declare them to their children; that they might set their hope in God, and not forget the works of God, but keep his commandments." To perform this important duty to good purpose, we must enforce our instructions by a consistent example: and it is awful to think how many parents, by their negligence and wickedness, become the murderers of the souls of their children. But should any young persons read these observations, who cannot but know that their parents are stubborn and rebellious: let them remember, that, though they must not expose their faults, or neglect to submit to them in all things lawful; yet they must neither obey their sinful orders nor copy their examples. On the contrary, they are bound to requite their kindness in things temporal, by earnestly praying for their conversion; and by recommending the profession of the Gospel to them, with the most respectful, obliging, and affectionate behaviour; and by such modest hints, as may consist with the honour due to that superior relation. The lax principles, the disobedience, and the apostacy of many professed Christians, show that they never set their hearts aright, and that their spirit was never steadfast with God: they were never duly humbled and set against sin; they never were weaned from the world, or prepared for the cross and the conflict; they never cordially received the Lord for their Portion and Salvation, counting all but loss in comparison of him. In time of temptation, therefore, like the cowardly Ephraimites, though armed as soldiers, they basely turn their backs on the enemy; "they renounce the covenant of God, and refuse to walk in his law."

V. 12-55.

We cannot avoid repeating, that in Israel's history we have a picture of our own hearts and lives, and a compendium of the history of the world, and of the church: (P. Obs. Neh. ix.) The common benefits afforded by the Creator to the whole human race, when viewed in connexion with our conduct towards him, evidently leave us without excuse. His sun rises to give us light, his rain descends to make the earth fruitful, and the seasons in succession pour forth an exuberance for our use and indulgence: yet these blessings are generally received with unthankfulness, and abused in intemperance; few are content with meat for their use, but almost all crave provision for their lusts, and are unwilling to trust the power and goodness of God for the future. Insensible of the protecting hand of Him, "in whom they live, and move, and are," most men spend their lives in rebellion: and when He is provoked

PSALM LXXIX.

The Psalmist complains to God of the desolations of Jerusalem, and the cruel insults of the heathen, 1—5. He prays for deliverance and forgiveness; and that the Lord would glorify himself, by avenging his people on their oppressors, 6—13.

to bring them into troubles and dangers, there are but few who seem to return to and inquire after him; and the event proves, that most of these few only "flatter him" with their mouth, and lie unto him with their tongues." So that God's patience, and the warnings and mercies which he sends, "to lead men to repentance," embolden them to harden their hearts, and treasure up wrath, until the measure of their iniquities is full; and then he casts upon them the fierceness of his wrath, and gives them up to be hardened and destroyed. The history of kingdoms, is much the same. God hath not indeed dealt with any nation, in every respect, as he did with Israel: but we constantly find that increasing affluence and prosperity have produced proportionable pride, luxury, licentiousness, and impiety: and that judgments and mercies have generally been neglected, or very superficially attended to, until the measure of their sins was filled; and then some other people were employed to execute the vengeance of God upon them. This hath appeared with peculiar evidence, in nations favoured with the word of God and professing his truth. The outward means of grace have been to them like the pillar of cloud and fire, and the Bread and Water of life; and manifold providential favours have been vouchsafed. But where is that nation professing Christianity, which hath not copied Israel's example? Certainly Britain is no exception to this rule. On us the manna hath been rained all around our habitations: and wells of salvation have been opened, and the waters of life have flowed, in almost every corner of our land. We have been equally favoured by an indulgent Providence, and have experienced many former and latter extraordinary deliverances: but neither judgments nor mercies have prevented the rapid increase of infidelity, profligacy, impiety, and oppression. And if under any pressing calamities we have seemed sensible of our obligations and dependence, and have returned, and inquired after God, our Rock and our Redeemer; the event hath detected our base hypocrisy. Hitherto, the Lord, being full of compassion, hath spared us: but if we still forget his mercies, and neglect and abuse his Gospel, what can we expect but that he will cast us off, and number us with the hardened Egyptians, and make a way for his anger, and glorify himself by inflicting judgments on us as singular as our mercies have been?—Even in those collective bodies, which have made a stricter profession of his truth, the case has been similar. Distinguished advantages have not prevented churches, one after another, from degenerating into formality or heresy, from forsaking the covenant and casting off the commandments of God. The profession and knowledge of the truth have in many instances only increased pride and presumption; men have administered the sacred ordinances as mere external forms; and they have rested upon the baptism of water, and the sacramental bread and wine, without the inward and spiritual grace signified by them. (1 Cor. x. 1—12.) Many religious societies have split into parties, and turned aside unto vain jangling; many have evidently returned back into the world; and others have declined to superstition and will-worship, and provoked God to jealousy with their high places and graven images: and neither warnings, mercies, nor judgments, have stopped their course, till their candlesticks have been removed, and their privileges given to others. Nor has any collective body yet been found, that hath been durably preserved from such declensions. Let those "which think they stand, take heed lest they fall." Even true believers are not unconcerned. Many of them can recollect, that for years they abused the kindness of Providence into an occasion of sin. The Lord's patience emboldened them in their evil courses; his bounty increased their self-indulgence; and even the warnings of his word, and their convictions of conscience, served to discover their obstinacy in rebellion. Perhaps a near prospect of death sometimes frightened them to their devotions, but upon recovery they relapsed into ungodliness. They must therefore now admire the Lord's compassion and forbearance, in that he did not stir up all his wrath against them and destroy them. At length he came with an out-stretched arm for their deliverance: and he found them slaves of Satan and in love with their bondage, nor could they be persuaded to accede to his invitations; nay, they hated and resisted his truths and convictions, until his new-creating grace had powerfully made them willing. Then he broke off their chains and rescued them from their oppressor; he forgave their sins, and supplied their wants, and opened their way to liberty: and their salvation, in its full latitude, far exceeded in love and power, that which Israel experienced when brought up out of Egypt. Since that time of mercy, he hath guided and guarded them: they have fed upon the Bread of heaven, and drunk water from the wells of salvation. But though many of them have been preserved from scandalous offences; yet how often have they grieved his Holy Spirit, and provoked his chastening rod! Frequently they have been discontented with their temporal provision, and craved meat for their lusts: they have secretly murmured at his appointments, and distrusted his power and love; they have limited him to their methods, and doubted whether he could otherwise provide or deliver! Alas! we have all provoked him by our unbelief, forgetfulness, and ingratitude; and have often been chastened, by having our inordinate desires granted in anger. Severe afflictions have been necessary to recover us from our backslidings; and though we were not mere hypocrites in returning to the Lord, yet we have soon forgotten the salutary lesson: if our hearts have perhaps been sincere, yet they have not been steadfast with him. So that it is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed with our fellow-sinners; and we have cause to review with shame and gratitude, every stage of our journey through the wilderness. And when we shall come to our inheritance, how shall we admire the Lord's patience and mercy, who led us forth like a flock, safely, and without cause of fear; who destroyed our enemies, and brought us through every intervening difficulty to the purchased possession of his heavenly kingdom! Then indeed we shall no more distrust or dishonour our God; we shall no more rebel or be ungrateful. In the mean time we should walk humbly and watchfully; trusting only in his mercy, and cheerfully submitting to the discipline and chastisement, which our remaining perverseness renders necessary, and praying daily that we may profit by all our trials and all our mis-carriages.

V. 56—72.

The church at large is also concerned in this review. God's power and mercy have been as conspicuous, in preserving her from being ruined by intestine corruptions, as in protecting her against external violence. Her history from the beginning, to the coming of the Redeemer, hath appeared to be a constant succession of gracious interpositions of God in her behalf, requited with continual rebellions and apostacies. Often did the Lord pour contempt upon the externals in which his professing people confided; and even delivered the ark of his glory and strength into captivity, and suffered their priests to be massacred by the heathen: yet in due time he arose again for their help, and put their enemies to shame, or cast them down into destruction. This appears very remarkably in the history of Israel till the days of David, whom he took from the sheep-folds to rule and feed his people, and to promote their prosperity and religious advantage. And their consequent history, until the coming of the Son of David, is of the same kind. Then Christianity succeeded to the Mosaic dispensation; and Jerusalem being desolated, the Jews were cast out of the church: and under the rule and guidance of the good Shepherd, who feeds his flock with the most perfect integrity and skilfulness, one would have expected a better state of affairs. Yet the history of the Christian church hitherto hath been of the same cast; and nothing but the patience of God could have borne with the abominations which have prevailed among men who are called by the name of Christ. Nor are matters yet much mended: and the experimental trial, which God hath made of human nature, under every dispensation, confirms his testimony, "that the heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked:" and that nothing but a new creation by the power of the Holy Ghost, can cure any of the human race, of their propensity to ungodliness and iniquity. May the Lord then arise as one awaked out of sleep, and put his enemies to a perpetual reproach! may he purify and unite his church; and raise up kings and pastors like David and like Christ, under whom his work may prosper, and true religion spread throughout the earth! And let us not limit our God: He can do all things, and can easily form proper instruments and make them successful, and render true piety as universal as iniquity hath hitherto been. But let every reader fear the doom of his enemies, and read with reverent attention, in the history of the Egyptians, and of those Israelites whose days were consumed in vanity and their years in trouble, the power of the wrath of God against the workers of iniquity. Let us all diligently seek the privileges of his true people, whom he spares and pities, as a father doth his children; "for he remembereth that they are but flesh; a wind that passeth away and cometh not again:" but let us be careful not to grieve our kind Friend, by distrust and ingratitude, and forgetfulness of his mercies, which will tend to our own loss. And if we would be useful and honourable in our generation, we must learn to stoop, to labour, to deny ourselves, and to be faithful and diligent in lower situations. For persons of this character have often been advanced to more eminent stations: and if as magistrates or ministers they feed the Lord's flock with integrity and skill, in the judgment of candid and liberal men, it will prove no real objection or reproach to them, though they have been educated with Moses, with Amos, and with David, in tending sheep; with Elisha in following the plough, or with the apostles in the fisherman's boat, or even at the receipt of custom.

NOTES.

PSALM LXXIX. V. 1—5. This psalm unavoidably leads our thoughts to the Babylonish captivity: yet some think that it was written long before; the Holy Spirit directing the Psalmist thus to furnish the church with proper meditations, in all such seasons of public calamity. (Notes, &c. Deut. xxxii. Ps. xlii. lxxiv.)—When Judah was desolated by hostile armies, the heathen possessed the inheritance that God had given his people. When Jerusalem was taken, the temple was profaned and destroyed; part of the inhabitants were buried in the ruins of the city; and others of them, whose blood was shed abundantly on every side, were left to be devoured by birds and beasts of prey: thus God's people were exposed to reproach and contempt, because they had provoked him to jealousy by their idolatries. The case hath often been similar, when persecutors and corrupters of the faith have profaned the church, and murdered the saints of God. 'To behold, or even to imagine, heaps of slaughtered bodies, lying unburied, and ‘exposed to birds and beasts of prey, is inexpressibly shocking to humanity: but with what unconcern are we accustomed to view on all sides multitudes dead in trespasses and sins, torn in pieces, and devoured by wild passions, filthy lusts, and infernal spirits, those dogs and vultures of the moral world? Yet to a discerning eye and a thinking mind, the latter is by far the more melancholy sight of the two.’ (Horne.)

V. 6, 7. The Jews deserved their sufferings from God; but their ravagers were extremely unjust, cruel, and impious. As the church cannot be delivered without the confusion and destruction of implacable persecutors; so we cannot pray for the one, without at least implying the other. Jeremiah has the same prayer with little variation; but whether he took it from this psalm, or the Psalmist from him, is not agreed; though the latter is most probable. The Chaldeans, whose destruction God had foretold, were especially meant: and so far from worshipping JEHOVAH, they blasphemed him, and cruelly oppressed his worshippers.

V. 8—13. The Psalmist does not plead, as in some other places, that his people, though oppressed and persecuted, were free from the guilt of idolatry and other atrocious crimes: but supposing them and their fathers to have been so criminal, as to deserve extirpation, (to which they seemed fast approaching;) he draws all his pleas from the compassion and tender mercies of God; from his regard, or rather zeal, for the honour of his name, which the idolaters would insolently blaspheme, if Israel should be destroyed; from the abject condition to which they were reduced, in which, unless prevented by speedy help, they must perish; from the greatness of his power; and that he might still have a people to praise his name to the end of time. The word rendered purge away our sins, means cover them with an atonement. No sacrifices were offered during the captivity, but this was a prayer for the restoration of the temple, and those expiatory oblations that typified the great atonement of Christ, which purgeth away the guilt of all believers, to the praise of the glory of God. Some expressions toward the close are so like those used by the martyrs and saints in St. John’s prophetic vision, or revelation, that it seems obvious to con-say, Where is their God? let him be known among the heathen in our sight, ^a by the [†] revenging of the blood of thy servants which is shed.

clude, the captivity of the church, under the New Testament-Babylon to have been specially intended by the Holy Spirit. (Marg. Ref.) The plea, taken from the greatness of JEHOVAH’s power, exactly resembles that doxology which concludes the Lord’s prayer. “For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever and ever. Amen.”

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We ought to be thankful, that we are not called to resist unto blood, and that the murderous rage of persecution is suspended for a season. Yet it is grievous to consider how many, who are heathens in their tempers and conduct, occupy important stations in the visible church, by which the holy temple is defiled, and Christianity is exposed to the reproach and scorn of infidels. It is also lamentable that the horrors and carnage of war are so much known, betwixt nations professing themselves the disciples of the Prince of peace, and that ambition and avarice shed the blood of Christians like water on every side, and render Jerusalem as it were a heap of ruins. The believer has also continual cause to lament, that the revival of indwelling sin, and the incursions of temptation, often pollute his body and soul, which are “the temple of God.” But every trouble, personal or public, springs from the anger of God, whom we often provoke to jealousy by our idolatrous attachments to earthly objects. We should therefore first deprecate his wrath, and seek the forgiveness of our iniquities; and beseech the God of our salvation to cleanse away the pollution and the guilt of our sins: and then he will prevent us with his tender mercies, and deliver us, however low we may be brought. When our calamities, or those of the church, give occasion to infidels and blasphemers to reproach the gospel, or to inquire, “Where is our God?” we have a prevailing plea in prayer; for wherefore should such persons have cause given them to triumph over the Lord’s servants? But we have no cause to be uneasy on our own account, if we be reproached for our piety or our sufferings: we should chiefly fear being reproached for acting inconsistently with our profession. We ought, however, to pray for the deliverance of the church from the contempt, as well as oppressions, of her enemies; and in so doing, should our prayers for their conversion not be granted, they will eventually be answered in the ruin of all such as “devour Jacob, and lay waste his dwelling place.” The blood of God’s servants will at length be avenged seven-fold upon those who shed it, and do not repent: and his wrath will be poured out upon all kingdoms, families, and persons, who have not known, or called upon, his name. But by the greatness of his power, and for the glory of his name, he will rescue his oppressed people: their sighing in captivity and in imprisonment come before him; and he will either preserve the lives of those whom persecutors appoint to die, or he will receive them to glory. So that the harmless sheep of his pasture will give him thanks for ever, according to the desire of their hearts; a succession of believers shall praise him to all generations; and the cause of God, however now run down, will finally triumph upon earth, as well as eternally in heaven.

NOTES.

PSALM LXXX. Title. Many are of opinion, that this psalm was written at the time when Jerusalem was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar: but some think that it relates to the desolations made by Sennacherib. Because, after the destruction of the city and temple by Nebuchadnezzar, God no longer “dwelt between the cherubim,” above the mercy-seat; as the ark and the mercy-seat, and the cherubim of gold, were destroyed, and never replaced: nor is the Lord, ever after that event, thus spoken of in Scripture; but Hezekiah, praying against Sennacherib, addressed God by this very title. (Is. xxxvii. 16, 17.) The Septuagint also expressly calls this, “A psalm against the Assyrian.” Again, Ephraim, and Manasseh, (2) seem to have had little concern in the affairs of Judah, at the time of the Babylonish captivity: but during the reign of Hezekiah, many of these, and the other tribes constituting the kingdom of Israel, accepted of his invitation, joined the Jews in keeping the passover, and afterwards assisted in breaking down the idolatrous high places and altars, not only in Judah, and in Benjamin as connected with Judah; but likewise in Ephraim and Manasseh, (2 Chr. xxxi. 1.) Yet just afterwards Sennacherib invaded the land, reduced the remnant of the ten tribes to abject slavery, over-ran Judah, and threatened to destroy Jerusalem and the temple. It was therefore natural, at this crisis, to implore, that God would stir up his strength, and come to save Judah; and thus show his glory, in the presence of Benjamin, in whose lot part of Jerusalem and of the temple was situated, and also before Ephraim and Manasseh, to encourage them, and to show that God approved Hezekiah’s zeal for reformation.

V. 1. The Psalmist seems to have offered this prayer, not for Judah only, but for the whole nation of Israel, including the ten tribes, which were subjugated, carried captive, and scattered by the Assyrians. JEHOVAH “the Shepherd of Israel,” the Protector, Ruler, and Guide of that favoured nation, had led Joseph, as well as Judah, like a flock, out of Egypt, through the desert and into Canaan: and there he dwelt between the cherubim, at Shiloh, in the tribe of Ephraim, before the ark was stationed at Jerusalem. The Psalmist therefore, remembering these ancient displays of the glory of God in the midst of his people, implores him again to shine forth in the splendour of his power, truth, and love, to dismay their enemies, and to rescue and cheer his worshippers. This divine interposition is represented by the breaking forth of the sun after a dismal tempest, and that pleasing change which ensues.

V. 2. These three tribes marched immediately after the ark and the cherubim by divine appointment in the wilderness, which seems to be here alluded to.

V. 3. In order to renewed prosperity and comfort, the Psalmist was well aware, that a revival of pure religion was necessary; and therefore he repeatedly prayed, and thus taught the people to pray, for renewing or converting grace, in order that God might cause “his face to shine on them, &c.” (Note, iv. 6.)

V. 4. This verse seems to mark out the time of Sennacherib’s invasion, and his rapid success, notwithstanding the zeal of Hezekiah, Isaiah, and others for reformation, and their continual prayers for the interposition of God in behalf of his people. “The faithful fear God’s anger, when they perceive that their prayers are not forthwith heard.”

V. 5, 6. ^a The afflictions of Israel were so heavy and of such long continuance, that their bread seemed to be dipped in, and their cup filled to the brim with, their tears; whilst their neighbours contended about dividing their spoil, and derided their miseries. The original word for great measure, means a large cup, and much larger than those which were commonly used to drink from.

V. 8—13. The nation of Israel, brought out of Egypt, planted in Canaan, (whose ancient inhabitants were extirpated to make room for it,) and favoured with many great advantages, temporal and spiritual, above all other nations, is here represented under the emblem of a vine planted in a well-cultivated vineyard. The people so multiplied and prospered, especially in the days of David and Solomon, that this vine, having taken deep root, overspread the whole country, from the Mediterranean sea to the river Euphrates; and its luxuriant branches grew strong like cedars, or covered the cedars to the top, by clinging to them. But nothing is here said of its fruitfulness; for it brought forth wild grapes; which was the reason why the heathen were allowed to desolate the land, as the wild boar would waste a vineyard; and why the Romans were afterwards permitted to destroy Jerusalem; and why the Lord took from the Jews their peculiar privileges, and conferred them on the Gentile churches: (Note.)—The vine is a constant emblem of the church of Christ, under every dispensation. It is a feeble tree, which needs support, and is of no value except for its excellent fruit. It produces a vast quantity of luxuriant branches, which not only yield no grapes, but must be pruned away, or they will hinder those upon the fruitful branches from ripening. Thus mere professors of Christianity are branches of the true Vine which must be taken away, and cast into the fire, in order that true believers may become more abundantly fruitful. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 15. The family of David, (which God had advanced and prospered, for the good of Israel, and for his own glory,) as typical of Christ, was perhaps meant by this Branch. Yet Christ himself, even the promised Messiah, seems to have been principally intended. The Septuagint translates the word, 'The Son of Man.'

V. 16. The vine above described, (or the nation which God had brought out of Egypt and planted in Canaan,) was in great measure cut down and burned with fire, by the dispersion of the ten tribes, and the success of the Assyrians in Judah; and though a remnant still remained, and a strong branch of David's race; yet if the anger of God were not turned away from them, they likewise must soon perish.

V. 17, 18. This may imply a request that God would strengthen and protect his king of David's race on the throne of Judah, for the protection of his people and the maintenance of true religion. But "the Man of God's "right hand," "the Son of man, &c." point out the promised Messiah very clearly, and may be considered as a prayer of the church for his coming, as "the power of "God," for the conversion of sinners, and the salvation of his people. Those who refer the psalm to the Babylonish captivity, interpret the preceding verse of the subversion of the kingdom, in the family of David after the death of Josiah: and these as a prayer for another king of the same race to be advanced to the throne; in order that the people might be induced and encouraged to adhere to the worship of God, and to call on him in every time of trouble.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

He who dwelleth on the mercy seat is the good Shepherd of his people, and leads them as a valued flock with all attention and tenderness. In all troubles and dangers let us beseech him to shine upon our souls and upon our path, that we may be cheered and directed by his presence and favour: and let us entreat him continually to stir up his strength, and come and save us. But we can neither expect the comforts of his love, nor the protection of his powerful arm, except we are partakers of his converting grace. When we discover our need of this invaluable blessing, we ought to pray earnestly for it: the same must be our conduct when we have lost our comfort, and are exposed to rebukes by having relapsed into sin, and are become sensible of the necessity of returning to the Lord our Rest: and in all public calamities, of churches or nations, we must observe the same order, and pray to be prepared by renewing grace for returning comfort and prosperity. The Lord is really angry at the prayers of the hypocrite, who employs them as a cloak for his iniquity: but not with those of any sinner, however vile, who sincerely seeks his mercy and grace. Yet whilst He proves our sincerity, and increases our humility and fervency, by delays, we often think that he is angry against our prayers, and will not accept them: but we shall certainly find the contrary, if we persevere in asking and seeking. The church of God in times of grievous oppressions, and the believer in times of darkness and distress, (especially when occasioned by sin,) may for a while be sunk in sorrows, and exposed to contempt and reproach: but when this leads to repentance, having sown in tears they will reap in more abundant joy. When we, in this favoured land, consider our manifold advantages, and our very disproportionate improvement of them, we shall perceive great cause for humiliation. We are planted, as in a well cultivated enclosure, with every means of being fruitful in the works of righteousness: but, alas! the useless leaves of profession, and the empty boughs of notions and forms abound far more than substantial piety and charity. The Christian religion, also, as planted by the apostles and primitive evangelists, took deep root, and hath spread very wide, so that it hath filled many nations: but it hath too generally proved an empty vine. The Lord's zeal for the honour of his own truth, precepts, and ordinances, may be pleaded with him as a reason, why he should not break down the hedges, and permit infidels and heretics to root up the vineyard; and may suggest an inquiry why he permits them so long to practise and prosper? sider the state of the purest parts of the visible church, we cannot wonder that we are visited with sharp corrections. He, however, who is not only the strongest Branch, but the Root and Stem of the vine; who is the man of God's right hand, "the Son of man whom the Father hath made so strong for himself," hath been carried through his work for his church, and is possessed of all power in heaven and earth for her benefit. The vine cannot therefore be ruined, nor can any fruitful branch perish: but the unfruitful will be cut off and cast into the fire. Let us then come to him and abide in him, "without whom we can do nothing;" let us beg of him to uphold and strengthen us, that we may not go back from him: and let us still call upon his name, in behalf of ourselves and of the whole church: "Turn us again, O Lord God of hosts, cause thy face to shine, and we shall be saved."

NOTES.

PSALM LXXXI. V. 1—5. It is probable that this psalm was composed in the time of David, when the ark had been removed to mount Zion; and that it was especially intended for the new moons, and that in particular which began the seventh month, called the feast of trumpets, or the new year according to the old computation. (Notes, Ex. xii. 2. Lev. xxiii. 24, 25. Num. x. 2—10. xxix. 1—6.) Some think that on this day Moses came down from the mount the second time, with the tables of the law, and full orders to erect a tabernacle, in the most sacred place of which these tables might be placed in the ark of the covenant, and covered with the mercy-seat, over which the glory of God, as dwelling among his people, was displayed; and that this day was observed as a memorial of that event, and a testimony of the relation which subsisted between God and Israel. The word rendered psalm, may signify the instruments of psalmody, some of which are afterwards enumerated—"Joseph's family was counted the chief before that of Judah was preferred." No doubt the descendants of Joseph were counted the chief, during most of the time that the Israelites continued in Egypt; as Joseph had there been the protector of the whole family.—God went through the land of Egypt destroying all the first-born; or against the land in all the plagues he inflicted.

ed: yet the feast of trumpets did not take place till almost seven months after Israel left Egypt; for their deliverance was in some sense incomplete, till Moses descended the second time from the mount, with the tokens of God's reconciliation to his offending people. In the last clause, the Psalmist evidently speaks in the name of the nation, or the church of God, a corporate body from age to age. It seems that the Israelites understood not the language of their haughty oppressors, which would tend to render their bondage more distressing. (cxiv. 1.)

V. 6. It is evident that the Lord himself speaks through the remainder of the psalm, though the change of person is not noticed. Some suppose that the voice of God, with which Israel in Egypt was unacquainted, was meant by the language which he understood not; and then this and the following verses may be considered as a recapitulation of God's messages to the nation by Moses during the events attending its deliverance. God then said to them; "I remove thy shoulder, &c." It is not certain what is meant by the pots: whether any earthen vessels which the Israelites were employed to make; or the kilns in which the bricks were burnt; or the brazen pots, in which the food for this immense number of slaves was prepared, the flesh-pots which they afterwards regretted.

V. 7. The secret, &c. Some think that this refers to the cloudy pillar, from the hidden recess of which JEHOVAH spake in mercy to his people, and as in thunder to his enemies. But perhaps mount Sinai is meant, from whose inaccessible summit, out of the midst of the thunder and lightning, the Lord spake the ten commandments; the first of which is afterwards referred to. (Notes, Ex. xix. xx.)

I proved, &c. (Notes, Ex. xvii. Num. xx. 1—13.)

V. 8—10. The old translation of these verses seems as literal as the present version, and more expressive. "Hear, O my people, and I will protest unto thee; O Israel, if thou wilt hearken unto me; and wilt have no strange god in thee, neither worship any strange god; (For I am the LORD thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt) Open thy mouth wide, and I will fill it." "If thou adherest to the worship of JEHOVAH alone, according to the terms of the national covenant; I will grant thee the largest desires of thy heart and requests of thy lips."

11 But ^a my people would not hearken to my voice; and Israel ^b would none of me.

12 So ^c I gave them up unto ^d their own hearts' lust: and ^e they walked in their own counsels.

13 ^f Oh that my people had hearkened unto me, and Israel had walked in my ways!

14 ^g I should soon have subdued their enemies, and ^h turned my hand against their adversaries.

According to the present translation of the ninth verse, the future is evidently put for the imperative: and it means "Let no strange God, &c." "There will be no need, I will abundantly supply all thy wants:" and the larger their desires and expectations, and the more copious and comprehensive their prayers were, the more abundantly would they receive from his all-sufficiency. It is almost impossible not to think in this place of our Lord's address to the Jews, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11, 12. Though Israel, as a nation, were the people of God, by profession, covenant, and the strongest obligations; they were not so by their own choice of him. They would not have him for their Portion and their Lord; but expected more advantages from their dumb idols than from Him! and therefore they were left to be judicially deceived, hardened, and ruined, as the just punishment of their sins. Thus Wisdom, (that is, Christ) complains, that men would have none of her counsel; yea, they despised and hated her, and this was the cause of their destruction.

V. 13. (Note, Deut. xxxii. 29.) Such expressions denote the Lord's willingness to receive returning sinners, and the delight which he takes in showing mercy and doing good, and in the faith and obedience of his people: and they prove, that the ruin of sinners is altogether the effect of their own pride and obstinacy. But it would be absurd to draw inferences from them, which cannot consist with other parts of Scripture. "One cannot help observing the similitude between the complaint here uttered, and one which hath since been breathed forth over the same people; 'O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not.'" (Horne.)

V. 15. "All that maligned their prosperity, and set themselves against the design of the LORD to make them victorious over their enemies, should have been so daunted, that they should have dissembled their hatred, and been forced at least to a counterfeit submission: but his people should have seen most blessed days, and enjoyed a substantial and durable happiness without any interrup-

V. 16. (Note, Deut. xxxii. 13, 14.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is our duty and privilege to attend on God's ordinances, and to abound in praise and thanksgiving : and we should excite one another to these pleasant services, embracing every opportunity for them, and improving all our ability in them. For the Lord is the Strength of his people ; and all the worship which we can render, is far beneath his glorious excellencies and our immense obligations to him, especially in our redemption from wrath and sin. When therefore he commands, and intimates his acceptance of this reasonable service, he testifies his mercy and condescending love to us. For we ought never to forget the base and ruinous drudgery to which Satan had reduced us ; or our rebellions against God, for which we deserved to have been left the bond-slaves of this cruel tyrant, and to have had our final portion with him. But when in distress of conscience we are led to cry for deliverance, the Lord answereth our prayers and sets us at liberty. As the giving of the law from mount Sinai, and the trials of Israel in the wilderness, were proofs of the Lord's peculiar regard to that people : so, humiliating convictions of sin and sharp afflictions are generally, and the law written in our heart is always, evidential of the love of God to our souls. But he speaks to many, both by the awful requirements and sanctions of his law, and by the invitations and promises of his Gospel, and even to many who profess themselves his people, who yet will not hearken to his voice or have him for their Portion ; for they foolishly expect more satisfaction from their lusts, than from the all-sufficient God. Thus they provoke him to give them up to their own hearts' lust, and to leave them to their perverse choice ; and then, whilst they prosper in wickedness, and are envied by their fellow-sinners, they ripen apace for eternal ruin. But the Lord delighteth in the conversion of sinners, and in the faith and obedience of his people. They may desire and ask as much as they will ; and he will answer and exceed their expectations : their enemies shall be subdued, their souls satisfied with those unspeakable blessings which flow from the Rock of salvation : their bodies shall be fed with food convenient for them, and their eternal inheritance be secured to them ; whilst all the haters of the Lord shall fall under his power and perish for ever. May He then incline our hearts to obey his call, and walk in his ways : and may he enlarge and assist our prayers ; that being delivered from our enemies, we may open our mouths wide, to take in the waters of life and salvation, and so drink and live for ever.

NOTES.

PSALM LXXXII. V. 1. JEHOVAH, who judgeth the principalities and powers of the invisible world, will call to account the greatest of those who exercise dominion over their fellow-creatures on earth. They seem as gods to their subjects, and they indeed are the Lord's appointed vicegerents : but they are the subjects of his kingdom, even as other men : and He is especially at all times present in their courts, to animadvert on the justice or injustice of their decisions, to receive appeals from their sentence when unrighteous, and to call them to a strict account, if they abuse their power. It is not known by whom, or when, this psalm was written ; some date it in David's time, and others in that of Hezekiah.

V. 2. 'Is it not time to leave off your partiality ; and no longer to favour a bad cause, because a man is rich and great ; and can either give you a large bribe, if you will judge it for him, or do you mischief if you give sentence against him ?' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 3, 4. (Notes, Ex. xxiii. 7, 8. 2 Chron. xix. 6, 7.) 'Your duty is to do equal justice to all men that come before you ; and to take particular care, that the poor and the fatherless, who have no money to give, nor any friend to solicit,—and men of low condition, be not unjustly condemned.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 5. 'They will not study the laws of God : or if they do, will not think it their interest to be governed by them ;—insomuch, that the foundations of the kingdom,

V. 6. The rulers of Israel, as especially appointed by the Lord to be his representatives, to judge according to his law, and to be types of his Anointed, were honoured with this high title; in which other magistrates shared in proportion to their religious advantages. But though outwardly honoured as gods, as children of the Most High, and as representing the Son of God himself: yet, as they in general abused these distinctions, the Lord would soon show them their weakness, as mean mortal men, and leave them to be cast down from their dignity, like one of the princes whom Israel crushed when they came up out of Egypt.
(Note, John x. 32—37.)

V. 8. ‘Seeing no amendment, he desireth God to ‘undertake the matter, and do justice himself.’ This verse however seems to be a prophetic prayer for the coming of the Messiah, and the conversion of the nations to him.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The authority of God is to be acknowledged, honoured, and submitted to, in those governors whom his providence places over us. But they also should be reminded, that they are only viceroys of the King of heaven, bound to do his will and copy his example; that he witnesseth the use which they make of their authority, and will judge them for it; and that if, with present impunity, they “judge “unjustly and accept the persons of the wicked,” they will have a severe sentence denounced on them at last.
These plain truths are too generally forgotten or discredited by those in authority: they know not, because they will not understand, therefore they walk on still in darkness:
and the perversion of law and justice, through their impiety and iniquity, subverts the foundations of social felicity, and enhances exceedingly the miseries of mankind. God hath indeed honoured rulers, (especially those placed over his people,) by entrusting to them, as it were, a share of his authority, and favouring them as children with a portion of his inheritance: and honourable and happy are they who, out of a regard to him, “defend the poor and father“less,” do justice to the afflicted and needy, and deliver them out of the hands of the wicked. But as for ungodly rulers, their disgrace and misery will equal their present abused distinctions; and they will feel the insignificance of that pre-eminence, which made them forget that they were men, when death shall arrest them and hurry them to judgment; and they shall be condemned with those princes who made war against Israel of old. We should however be thankful for the blessings of civil government, which, with all its defects, is of great advantage to mankind. And we should pray for our rulers: and leave such as misbehave to the judgment of God. But considering the state of affairs in the world, from the beginning hitherto; we have need, even on that account, to pray that the Lord Jesus would arise and take possession of his inheritance, and rule over all nations, in truth, righteousness, and peace.

NOTES.

PSALM LXXXIII. V. 1—4. It is generally and with probability conjectured, that this psalm was written, (perhaps by some of Asaph’s descendants,) in the reign of Jehoshaphat, when a most formidable confederacy was formed against him, and when Judah was invaded by a very large army composed of many nations, of whom the Moabites and Ammonites seem to have been the principal, and the others their allies: and it appears, that enmity to God and religion, excited by Jehoshaphat’s zeal for reformation, had a considerable effect in exciting them against him. So that it was, in fact, the cause of God that they opposed; uniting crafty policy with powerful exertions entirely to destroy his people, and blot out the memorial of them from the earth. The term hidden ones, seems to denote the Lord’s peculiar people, who were hidden under his immediate protection from the devices of their enemies.

V. 9—11. (Notes, Judg. iv.—viii.)

V. 12. The houses of God seems to denote, not only the temple and its out-buildings; but also the palaces and houses, in which the princes, priests, and chief persons of God's people dwelt. It is not certain, that any buildings for the public worship of God, (like the synagogues of later ages,) were at this time erected. But perhaps these idolaters might consider the high places as houses of God, especially such as were not used in idolatry.

V. 13—18. So many of the verbs in this passage are imperative, that it must be interpreted as a prayer: but it should be observed, that the persons prayed against were the enemies and haters of God, who sought with implacable malice to extirpate his people, and destroy the true religion; and that the honour of God and the interests of truth and righteousness required this example of severity. —The images employed are very striking, and are best explained by the marginal references. The expression “that they may seek thy name,” implies that the imprecation was only meant, in the strongest sense, on the supposition that the invaders remained incorrigible in enmity to God, in which case “let them be confounded and troubled for ever, &c.” that men of other nations may take warning, and learn by their doom, that JEHOVAH the God of Israel, is the Almighty Lord of the whole earth.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Enmity to the holiness and authority of God is the real cause of the hatred borne to his people. Men of different nations, interests, parties, humours, and sentiments, readily unite against the church. The precise Pharisee, the time-serving Herodian, and the infidel Sadducee, agreed to hate and oppose Christ: Herod and Pilate, though before at enmity, were made friends, as being of one mind to treat Jesus with contempt: and hypocrisy and profaneness, superstition and skepticism, and even enthusiasm and atheism,

VOL. II.—No. 15.

often confederate against his humbling doctrine and holy cause. For the consultation has been from the beginning, how to extirpate the church, that neither preacher nor professor of the truth should be left, and “that the name of Israel should be had no more in remembrance.” But whatever arrogance, tumult, subtlety, or resolution may be found among those who hate the Lord, and would lay their hands on his worshippers, and “take to themselves his houses in possession;” their intentions must ultimately be frustrated. His people, whose “life is hid with Christ in God,” and whose excellency is equally hid from the carnal eye, are safe under his protection. Whilst the Lord is still and keeps silence, and persecutors insult and triumph, the apparent danger often excites believers to greater fervency in prayer; and then in due time he arises to plead their cause; so that the doom of the ancient enemies of the church will be that of all others to the end of the world, or else one still more dreadful. For such are “vessels of wrath fitted for destruction,” even as a bowl is fitted to roll impetuously down a declivity, as stubble to be driven before a vehement wind, or as the dry wood, thorns, and brambles upon the mountains are fitted to be consumed by the flames: and the stormy tempest of divine vengeance will persecute them with dreadful consternation into “the fire prepared for the devil and his angels;” unless they be so humbled, and ashamed of their sins, as to repent and seek the pardoning mercy of their offended Lord; for assuredly all impenitent sinners shall be troubled, and ashamed, and shall perish for ever. The Lord will be glorified in the punishments which he inflicts: if present judgments fail of bringing those who suffer them to repentance, they are often so evidential of his power and justice, as to warn others to flee from his wrath and seek his favour: and doubtless the final punishment of the wicked will answer most important purposes, throughout the universal and everlasting kingdom of God. But may we so know, that “He, whose name is JEHOVAH, is most high over all the earth,” as to fear his powerful wrath, seek his inestimable favour, trust his mercy and grace, and yield ourselves to be his willing and devoted worshippers and servants; and may we chiefly seek the destruction of those tumultuous and confederated enemies, our “fleshly lusts, “which war against the soul.”

NOTES.

PSALM LXXXIV. V. 1, 2. It is not said by whom, or on what occasion, this psalm was written; but it is generally supposed that David composed it, when driven from Jerusalem by Absalom's rebellion. (Notes, xlii. xliii. lxiii.) Yet this is by no means certain: and some think that it was made by some pious Levite, in the days of Hezekiah, when kept from the temple by the Assyrian army. The Psalmist, however, reflecting with regret on the beauties of the sanctuary, and the delight he had taken in attending on the ordinances there administered; not only breaks out in the language of strong and ardent desire to be restored to the courts of God: but declares that his soul so earnestly longed after God himself and the enjoyment of his love, that his body also was affected by it. Or he may mean, that he longed to “present his body as “a living sacrifice,” by such external acts of worship, as would most suitably express the fervent affections of his soul.

V. 3. The Psalmist seems here to envy the birds their privilege of building their nests at or near to the altars of God; (meaning the tabernacle or temple, where were the altar of burnt-offering and the altar of incense,) while he was driven as an exile to a great distance from them. Yet, as it can scarcely be conceived that the birds were left unmolested in their nests to hatch and brood their young, at the altar of God, in the days of David, it has been supposed that he only meant that the birds found in their nests that tranquillity, repose, and satisfaction, which the ordinances of God had afforded him, but of which he was now deprived.

V. 4. Some of the priests and Levites dwelt continually at the sanctuary, which to a carnal mind might appear a wearisome confinement: but the Psalmist deemed them very happy; and those also who resided so near to the courts of God, that they could constantly join in the praises and adorations there presented, and who counted this their delightful employment. The Septuagint renders the latter clause, “They will praise thee for ever and ever,” by the strongest term for eternity contained in the Greek language: and no doubt the Psalmist counted those happy who perpetually praised God at the sanctuary on earth; because this was both a preparation for the eternal worship of heaven, and an earnest of it.

V. 5. ‘Happy also is that man, (how mean soever his ‘outward condition be,) who, relying on the divine protection, (Ex. xxxiv. 24.) goes up three times a year to the ‘solemn feasts at Jerusalem; or when—debarred that liberty,—is one of those devout persons, whose hearts are ‘more in the high-ways that lead thither, than at their own ‘home.’ (Bp. Patrick.) The man who, trusting in God for strength and protection, pressed through dangers and difficulties, from cordial love to the courts of God, aptly represented those who, being strong in the Lord, walk with alacrity in his ways, aspiring and longing for the joys of heaven.

V. 6, 7. ‘The valley of Baca, or of mulberry-trees, ‘was a barren place: so that they which passed through ‘must dig pits for water; signifying that no lets can ‘hinder them that are fully bent to come to Christ's church, ‘neither yet will God ever fail them.’ Some translate Baca, weeping, or misery: and probably it was a dreary valley, through which from some parts of the land the people must pass, in going up to Jerusalem: but in one way or other, they who, from regard to the ordinances of God, encountered the difficulty, were carried well through it. The word rendered the pools, signifies also blessings; and the clause may well be rendered, “The rain of blessings ‘covereth them;” not only refreshing rain, in plenty, to cool the ground and supply them with waters, but also showers of “blessings,” or heavenly consolations. (Ez. xxxiv. 26.) Thus they were enabled to proceed with increasing vigour and alacrity; till each of them appeared before God in his courts on mount Zion; or till, “the God

8 O LORD God of hosts, hear my prayer; give ear, O God of Jacob. Selah.

9 Behold, O God ^p our Shield, and look upon ^q the face of thine Anointed.

10 For ^r a day in thy courts is better than a thousand. * I had rather be a door-keeper in the house of my God,

“of gods appeared to them in Zion,” manifesting his glory and communicating spiritual blessings through his holy ordinances. The whole description may be fairly accommodated to the Christian’s pilgrimage through this vale of tears to the felicity of heaven.

V. 8, 9. The power of the LORD God of hosts to repel every enemy, and remove every obstacle, and his readiness to hear the requests of the patriarch Jacob and his descendants, encouraged the Psalmist’s earnest prayer, to be permitted, according to the desire of his heart, to return to the courts of God. He also entreated him to “look on the face of his Anointed;” “his Christ, the ‘King, as the type of Christ:’ or ‘for Christ’s sake, whom ‘I represent.’” If David wrote the psalm, he might mean to request God, that he would favour his king, whom he had expressly chosen and ordered to be anointed; and not suffer a rebel and an usurper to prevail against him. But he is generally supposed to have looked forward to, and presented his prayer in, the name of the promised Messiah, of whom he was the type and progenitor: and indeed he might plead it, as a powerful argument why the Lord should rescue him from his enemies, that the Messiah was to descend from him; and expect that the root should be preserved for the sake of that illustrious Branch.

V. 10. ‘I would rather choose to be in the lowest and ‘basest room in thy holy tabernacle, than to be settled in ‘whatsoever dignity out of the bounds of thy church.’ (Hall.)

V. 11, 12. The sun enlightens, warms, enlivens, and fructifies the face of the earth: thus the Lord gives light, comfort, and fruitfulness to those on whom he shines with the beams of his saving grace. This sun may indeed be clouded or eclipsed: but it remains unchanged, and will soon burst forth again as if with increased splendour. (2 Sam. xxiii. 4.) In this world the LORD gives grace, which, as a Sun, he ripens into glory in the world above: while as a Shield he protects the happy man who trusts in him, against all assailants, however formidable; and withholds nothing truly good from any who walk before him in truth. This the Psalmist knew, which cheered his spirits amidst his tribulations, and while he waited the answer to his prayers.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Divine ordinances are the believer’s solace in this evil world; because in them he communes with the living God, and enjoys his gracious presence. This renders his tabernacles so amiable in his eyes and dear to his heart: this causes him to value the privilege of attending them; and to regret, as the greatest calamity, the banishment or confinement from them. Indeed the Lord himself is the Rest of his people: but on earth, they cannot approach him, except through his appointed means of grace: so that these 11 For the LORD God is ^t a Sun and ^u Shield: ^a the LORD will give grace and glory: ^v no good thing will be withheld from them that ^z walk uprightly.

are to their souls, as the nest to the bird, which resorts thither and is contented and easy, but is unsettled when absent: yet this is only an earnest of the happiness of heaven, where the blessed inhabitants are always praising their God. But how can they dream of entering that holy habitation, and sharing its pure pleasures and society, who complain of the worship of God on earth as a tedious and wearisome task! who think those wretched, that spend all their days in his service; because they share not the carnal pleasures and dissipations, which themselves prefer to the employment of angels! But not only are they happy, who have arrived at heaven; they likewise may be congratulated, who have set out with the desire of their hearts, in search of that felicity; and who, making the Lord their Strength, walk with pleasure in his ways, and approve them in their hearts. They may have to pass through many a valley of weeping, and many a thirsty desert: but wells of salvation shall be opened for them, and consolations sent for their support. The journey itself, and the prospect of its happy end, will revive their hearts: they shall go from strength to strength, with increasing cheerfulness and confidence, till every one of them arrives safe in the holy city, to appear before God, to see him as he is, and to be for ever with him, and like unto him. May the Lord then incline the heart of every one of us to set out and proceed with alacrity in this pilgrimage, and may he defend us through it: may we pray without ceasing, (through the great Mediator, the Lord’s Anointed; whose face he beholds, and whose intercession he delights in,) for ourselves and for all our fellow-travellers. Thus we shall learn to count one day in God’s courts better than a thousand spent elsewhere; to value the little time we have employed with him, more than all the rest of our lives; and to deem the meanest place in his service preferable to the highest preferments in the tents, or even in the palaces of the ungodly. If we do not choose in this manner, we are carnally-minded, and “to be carnally-minded is death:” but what can all the honours, riches, and distinctions of the world do for us, compared with the blessings of His favour, who is the Sun and the Shield of his people? If he gives us grace here, and glory hereafter, he will not withhold any thing truly good from us. And though he hath not engaged to give riches and temporal dignities: yet he hath promised to give grace and glory to every one, who seeks for them in his appointed way; and he delighteth in fulfilling this promise. What is grace, but heaven begun below, in the knowledge, love, and service of God? What is glory but the completion of this felicity, in perfect conformity to him, and the full enjoyment of him for ever? And if he hath begun to give us grace, his grace will be sufficient for us, and will certainly ripen into glory. Let us then seek this true happiness; and desire to be fruitful, through the benign influences of the Sun of righteousness, as well as safe and cheerful under the protection of the Shield of salvation. Let us study to walk uprightly in his ways, and trust in his mercies: let us thankfully receive what he gives, and be well satisfied to be without what he withholds or takes away; for we may be sure that he sees it evil for us: and let us hold it fast, as an indisputable principle, notwithstanding all possible tribulation, that “the man is happy who trusteth in “the LORD of hosts, the God of Jacob.”

NOTES.

PSALM LXXXV. V. 1—3. This psalm seems to have been written either during the Babylonish captivity, or before the people were re-established in their own land. ‘It might be much better used by them, (the Jews,) after ‘their return from the captivity of Babylon than at any ‘other time; when they were infested with many enemies, ‘who disturbed the peaceable enjoyment of their country ‘and religion.’ (Bp. Patrick.) The Lord had formerly been favourable unto their fathers, and had often brought back their captivity, having pardoned those sins for which they had been sold into the hands of their enemies: and this gave the captive Jews encouragement again to expect deliverance. Or, ‘we have received the beginnings of deliverance as a token of thy forgiveness and reconciliation: ‘therefore perfect what concerneth us.’

V. 4. ‘Our sins indeed deserve worse than all our ‘sufferings, and retard our re-establishment; but turn and ‘convert us to thyself by thy special grace, and make way ‘for the more complete effects of thy reconciliation to us.’

V. 7. ‘He confesseth that our salvation cometh only ‘of God’s mercy.’

V. 8. The prophet, having prayed for mercy and salvation, waited to hear what message God the Lord would send by him; being assured that He had thoughts of peace towards the nation of Israel, whom he had taken for his people and specially favoured; and that a Peace-maker would at length be sent to them. But as folly, or idolatry and wickedness, had brought on them their former miseries, he warned them to beware, that when again favoured and prospered, they did not return to the same foolish and rebellious conduct. After the captivity, the nation was preserved from idolatry till the Redeemer came; and he both went himself and sent his apostles and ministers, first to speak peace to Israel, and to bless them by turning every one of them from his iniquities: but the nation rejected him and his message, and, returning to rebellion and folly, was deprived of its peculiar privileges; and then peace was spoken in Christ’s name, to the Gentiles, who became the people and saints of God by faith in Christ Jesus, and returned no more to their dumb idols and evil courses. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9. The temple and ordinances of God had been the glory of Israel; and that glory in some measure dwelt among them again after the captivity. But the Redeemer, who appeared in that land, was its chief Glory; his coming approached, and his salvation was always nigh those who feared the Lord. Christ himself, “the Salvation of God,” and the glory of his people Israel, was evidently predicted; and the expectation of this great Deliverer was intended to be the support of true believers under their trials, through successive ages; even as the expectation of his coming to make his cause triumphant, and at length to raise the dead and judge the world is, under the New-Testament dispensation.

PSALM LXXXVI.

David pleads his need, and the fervour of his devotion, in imploring help from the God of grace and mercy, 1—7. He praises God, as alone worthy of universal adoration, 8—10. He prays for teaching and grace, renders thanks for former mercies, complains of his haughty foes, and craves some token of divine favour, 11—17.

V. 10—13. When God restored the captive Jews, he mercifully fulfilled his faithful promises to them. He had glorified his justice in their sufferings, and he might consistently return unto them in peace. Thus while truth was preferred on earth, righteousness looked down from heaven with approbation. The Lord conferred manifold benefits on his people: their land again gave its increase, both of the fruits of the earth, and of the fruits of righteousness; for the justice and holiness of God, which had been so conspicuous in those dispensations, had a powerful effect to attach the people to his ordinances and commandments, and to teach them to copy the example of his equity, truth, and mercy. Thus this passage may be explained; but the interpretation is comparatively uninteresting, and falls below the energy of the expressions made use of. It is therefore generally, and justly, no doubt, interpreted in a far higher and fuller sense, of the harmony of the divine attributes in the redemption of sinners by Jesus Christ. The truth of the promises is manifested by the mercy of God in sending the Redeemer; and the truth of the types and prophecies in his person, miracles, obedience, and atonement: but especially the truth of the threatenings now consists with the exercise of mercy to sinners, through the great Surety, “who bare their sins in his own body on the tree.” The justice of God, which renders to all their due, demanded the punishment of the transgressor, and seemed to preclude all hope of his obtaining favour: but it is now satisfied by the great atonement, and amicably embraces and unites with peace; and entirely approves of the believing sinner being treated as a righteous person by a reconciled Judge. Thus Christ, the TRUTH, and Life, sprang out of the earth, when he was born of a woman: and justice looked down upon his character, obedience, and atonement, well-pleased and satisfied. For his sake the father giveth all good things, especially his Holy Spirit, to those who ask him; and by his influence every land where the Gospel is preached produces an increase of believers and of holiness to the glory of God. Righteousness, as a harbinger, marched before and marked out the Redeemer’s path, which he pursued without deviation through his whole course; his righteousness went before to prepare his mediatorial throne; and when it is discovered to the believer for his justification, by the teaching of the Holy Spirit, it becomes also his example, and he learns to walk in the steps of Christ, as well as to rely on his merits. This harmony of the divine perfections in man’s salvation is the grand peculiarity of the Christian religion, by which it displays the glory of God in full perfection. No other religion, no other view of Christianity, but that for substance here stated, makes any provision for the honour of the divine justice in the exercise of mercy; and this accords to the language of the prophets and apostles in many places. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The mercies shown to Israel, in their deliverance from bondage and captivity, were external signs of that redemption afforded in all ages to the remnant of believers, in setting them free from the bondage of sin and Satan, which always accompanies the covering of their sins, and the turning away the fierce wrath of God from them. The awakened sinner, when distressed in conscience, should attend to this report, and cry earnestly to the God of salvation, to convert him by his grace, and mercifully to cause his anger to cease from him; nor will that anger endure for ever against any but the impenitent and unbelieving. Even the true people of God, when they commit sin, may expect sharp and tedious afflictions: but when they return to him, humbly praying, that he would “show them his mercy, and grant them his salvation;” he will in due time revive their comforts, and make them again to rejoice in him. Having spoken unto the Lord in prayer, we should compose ourselves to hear him speak to us by his word; and to expect an answer by his Spirit, or in his providence. He will certainly speak peace to his people, whom he hath separated and sanctified to himself. Yet let them take warning that they do not turn again to folly, forgetful of his rebukes and corrections, and abusing his mercy; for this conduct so much resembles that of hypocrites, that it must bring them into uncertainty and distress; and the Lord will resent it greatly, if their falls do not teach them watchfulness, and their recoveries gratitude. The preaching of the Gospel, and the lively ordinances of God, confer more honour on any land, city, or village, than all external distinctions can do: and “his salvation is nigh those who fear” his wrath, reverence his authority, and humbly seek his mercy. For in the Redeemer’s person and work, all things are ready for the reception of every one whose heart is prepared to accept of mercy: all the Persons and perfections in the Godhead will be eternally glorified in the salvation of sinners: and the application of redemption to their souls, when they repent and believe the Gospel, is a continuation of the display which was made of the divine truth, justice, and mercy, when the Redeemer paid the all-sufficient ransom. Through him the sinner asks and receives all things pertaining to life and godliness, and thus becomes fruitful in every good work: and by looking unto the Saviour’s righteousness, he finds his feet set in the way of his steps. May this salvation be communicated to our hearts, and appear in our lives; that as the divine attributes harmonize in our redemption, so all Christian graces may harmonize in our characters. May this glory dwell in our land, and yield a large increase of truth and goodness, of purity and equity, through successive generations. May the Lord revive his church throughout all the earth, that his people may rejoice in him; may he grant that all, who are called Christians, may be led into the way of truth, and hold the faith in unity of spirit, in the bond of

NOTES.

PSALM LXXXVI. Title. It is not certain, whether David offered this prayer when persecuted by Saul, or when driven out of the land by Absalom; though the latter seems most probable.

V. 2. Holy. One whom thou favourest, hast set apart for thyself, and made partaker of sanctifying grace: one who has found favour and learned mercy. It is the same word which in the sixteenth psalm is translated holy One, and it is generally rendered a saint. When St. Paul spoke of himself, as "less than the least of all saints," he, (as David does here,) united the deepest poverty of spirit, with the fullest confidence that he was in a state of grace, and an accepted servant of God.

V. 3-5. David prayed not only every day, but all the day, that is, frequently, constantly, and importunately: and he not only lifted up his voice, but his soul, his most earnest desires, unto God: and therefore he expected that he should be made joyful by an answer to his supplications; because, though conscious of sin, in many instances, yet he firmly believed that God was kind, propitious, and compassionate to all who thus called on him.

V. 8. The Gentiles indeed might call on their gods, and yet perish in their perils and miseries; as the objects of their idolatry had no power to save them: but the God whom David worshipped was not like them, but infinitely powerful as well as merciful; and his former works for his people encouraged the expectation of effectual aid to all his upright worshippers.

V. 9. It is probable, David hoped that God's interposition in his behalf, and his celebration of his glory, would bring many of the neighbouring nations to renounce idolatry and worship their Creator; but "the Spirit of God which spake by him, and whose words were in his tongue," evidently predicted the calling of the Gentiles by the gospel, and the universal prevalency of Christianity.

The original is expressly a prediction; and is generally thus translated. "This proveth that David prayed in the name of the Messiah, of whose kingdom he doth here prophesy."

V. 11. Unite, &c. Naturally all the powers of our mind are "out of course." The judgment is darkened, the will perverted, and the affections, instead of cheerfully following the directions of the higher powers of the soul, tumultu-ate and rebel against them. The effect of grace is, to correct this disorder: and to subject the passions to the dominion of right reason, by subjecting the whole soul to the authority of God. But its operations are never in this world carried to perfection. Still the mind which loves God, and "delights in his law after the inner man," "finds another law within warring against the law" which it would fain obey. "It cannot therefore do the things which it would:" still the affections are apt to wander after forbidden objects: and too often the consent of the will is, for the time, drawn over to that which it habitually rejects. The harmony of holiness is broken, or not yet perfectly restored: the flesh lusteth against and is contrary to the spirit. Thus the heart is divided and an inward strife maintained, to the deep affliction of the believer.
—Thus is he prepared oftentimes to cry, "O wretched man that I am:" and at all times to pray, "Unite my heart," so liable to distraction, so prone to division between God and the world, "to fear thy name."

V. 13. Many confine the meaning of these words to the imminent danger of death from which God had delivered his servant: but perhaps David referred to the guilt of murder and adultery, which he had contracted, and which merited the severest vengeance, temporal and eternal; yet the Lord of his great mercy had pardoned those as well as all his other sins, and had thus delivered his soul from the lowest hell. It is the same word that is used concerning Christ, and translated hell. It means the invisible state, whether of the body in the grave, or the soul in the world of spirits: but the word lowest favours the latter interpretation. Some think that David here also spake as the type of Christ; which was certainly the case in the sixteenth psalm.

V. 14, 15. Many a time God had rescued his servant from the most extreme danger: but again he stood in urgent need of the same powerful aid. Absalom, Ahithophel, and the other conspirators, being proud, violent, cruel, and impious men, sought to murder him; and perhaps were encouraged to hope for success by an idea that David's crimes had provoked God to forsake him. And indeed David seems here to allow that would have been the case, had the Lord dealt with him in rigorous justice: but the abundant mercy of God to the most guilty and miserable, and his faithfulness to his promises, gave the humble penitent a firm ground of confidence that he was pardoned, and should be delivered from such haughty and impious assailants.

V. 16. The son, &c. David seems here to plead that his pious mother had brought him up in the fear of God, and offered many prayers for him; and therefore he was devoted to him from his birth, and intrusted to his keeping, having been brought up as a servant in his family: as the children of the female slaves brought up in their master's family, were considered as his property, and were entitled to his protection. The Lord Jesus was the Son of her who said, "Behold the handmaid of the Lord, be it unto me according to thy word."

V. 17. If God would show some evident token of favour, and so evidently interpose that all might see his determination to help and comfort his servant; David seems to have hoped that even his virulent enemies might be put to shame, and brought to repentance, and so share the plenteous mercy of God. The resurrection of Christ and the descent of the Holy Spirit were tokens for good to the church; which put all those who had crucified the Lord of glory to shame and confusion, and many of them were likewise brought to repent and believe the Gospel.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The condescension of our God, in bowing down his ear to receive the prayers of us wretched sinners, is very wonderful: yet our very poverty and wretchedness, when felt and acknowledged, form a powerful plea at the throne of grace. — It is a great encouragement in prayer, to be conscious that we have experienced the converting grace of God, and have learned to trust in him and to be his servants; for, once we served other masters, and leaned on other dependences; but he hath mercifully effected the important change. If we cry unto the Lord daily, and lift up our souls unto him, we may hope that he will both preserve and rejoice our souls. Yet our defective holiness, our scanty services, and our imperfect prayers, would be no ground of confidence, if we had not a God of infinite mercy to approach unto. His readiness to forgive, through that great atonement which he hath provided, and his plenteous mercy to all that call upon him, are the original source of our encouragement: and our own consciousness of integrity and most devoted obedience, are merely evidential of the reality of our faith, and of the grace of God bestowed upon us. The abundance of his mercy, to pardon all the sins and to supply all the wants of those who call upon him, how many soever they may be, are sufficient to encourage all who come with the desire of their hearts to pray before him: yet even this plenteous mercy will not profit those who remain too careless, proud, carnal, and unbelieving, to call on him for grace and salvation. The vanities of the heathen could not assist their deluded votaries; angels and saints cannot relieve those who worship them; our God alone possesses omnipresence and omniscience, almighty power, and infinite love; without which none can know or help us in all our necessities, and bear with all our provocations. None of the works ascribed to idols, are at all like the works of JEHOVAH, among which that of redemption stands pre-eminent. Nor can those worldly objects which men idolize give them any assistance in the hour of distress, at the approach of death, or at the day of judgment. All nations, therefore, whom God hath made, are bound, in interest as well as duty, to come and worship before him, and to glorify his name; seeing "He is great, and doeth wondrous things, and is God alone;" and the time approacheth, when they shall understand their interest, and do their duty in this respect. The gracious soul is often more desirous to be taught the way and truth of God, in order to walk in them, than to be delivered out of severe distress. — The most upright believers find it difficult to attain to that simplicity and singleness of heart which they long for, and they still find cause to pray, "Unite my heart to fear thy name, O LORD." Nay, the most eminent Christian will most readily confess that he hath deserved "the lowest hell," and expects deliverance from it only by the rich mercy of God: and being thus humbled, and taught to trust in Him for salvation, and prepared to "praise him for it with his whole heart, and to glorify

“his name for evermore,” he possesses an evidence, that he is indeed “delivered from the wrath to come.” But men of this character will often have reason to complain, that the proud, the violent, and those who set not God before them, have arisen against them to conspire their hurt, and especially, that the powers of darkness seek after their souls. Still, however, the compassion, long-suffering, and plenteous mercy and truth of God, will be their refuge and consolation: to him will they look for help and strength, as well as for pardon; and they will wait on him to give them from time to time some token for good, in their own experience from his comforting Spirit, and in the sight of others from his providential interpositions; that they who hate them may see and be ashamed, and either converted or intimidated. It is an encouragement to us, when we pray, to recollect that others have prayed, or are praying for us: and they whose parents were the servants of the Lord, and brought them up for him, may urge that as a plea why he should hear and help them.—But in considering David’s experience, and that of the believer, as corresponding with it; we must not lose sight of Him “who, though he was rich, for our sakes became poor, that we through his poverty might be rich.” He most perfectly served and continually called upon his heavenly Father; and through him the plenteous mercy of our God is exercised towards the chief of sinners. Being raised from the dead, he is made triumphant over the assemblies of proud and violent men who sought after his soul; and all nations shall come and worship before him, and glorify the name of the Lord; but all who hate him shall be ashamed and perish for ever. May we trust his merits and copy his example, and learn from him to bear poverty, hardship, or persecution, with cheerfulness and resignation; and to hope and wait for a happy issue out of all our tribulations.

NOTES.

PSALM LXXXVII. V. 1. Some think that this psalm was composed to be sung when the foundation of the temple on mount Moriah was laid; or when David fixed on the spot where the temple was to be erected. (Marg. Ref.) Mount Moriah seems to have been a part of mount Zion. “It is his,” or God’s, “foundation in the mountains of holiness.” The abruptness of the beginning shows how full the Psalmist’s mind was of joy and admiration. The tabernacle placed, and the temple afterwards built, by express divine direction on these holy mountains, were typical of Christ as the Foundation, and his church, as “built on this Foundation, for an habitation of God through the Spirit.”

V. 2. Because of the temple and its typical ordinances, the Lord delighted in Zion more than in all the dwellings of Jacob, and in all the secret and social worship performed by that people, who were selected from the nations of the earth to be near unto him.

V. 3. “Though thy glorious state do not yet appear; yet wait with patience, and God will accomplish his promise.” “Pleasant for situation and magnificent in its buildings, Jerusalem was the joy of the whole earth. There was the royal residence of the kings of Judah; there was the temple and the ark, and the glory; and the King of heaven dwelling in the midst of her. Her streets were honoured with the footsteps of the Redeemer; there he preached,—and died, and rose again; thither he sent down his Spirit, and there he laid the foundations of his church.” (Horne.) The glorious things spoken by the Spirit of prophecy concerning Zion, certainly related to future ages, to the coming of Christ, the Gospel sent forth from Jerusalem to all the nations, the establishment of the church, and to that church itself, both as militant on earth, and triumphant in heaven. “For even that which was made glorious,” (in Zion the type and feeble shadow,) “hath no glory in this respect, by reason of the glory that excelleth.” (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4. This is generally understood as a prediction of the calling of men from all these nations into the church by the Gospel: but it seems rather to be a comparison between the most eminent characters, which other nations had produced, and in whom they gloried; and the worthies of Zion, or the church, “I am wont to make honourable mention among my acquaintance of Egypt and Babylon, &c. bidding them observe that such a notable person was born there.” (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 5. “But what is this to Zion, of whom it shall be said in future times, that “this and that man” a great many worthies,—were born in her: for she hath no meaner instructor than the Most High, who shall settle her in a flourishing estate, by educating and forming her inhabitants to the most excellent qualities.” (Bp. Patrick.) The word rendered man, is generally used for a person of eminence; and the clause “this and that man,” is simply a repetition of that word, “a Man, a Man,” which, some think, is used as a peculiar superlative, and means, the most eminent of men, even the Lord Jesus Christ, and they suppose that He, in his divine nature, is “the most Highest” that “shall estab-

PSALM LXXXVIII.

The Psalmist bewails before God his complicated sufferings, with great ener-

“lish the church.” No doubt He is the glory of the church and of his people Israel: but his crucifixion was the deepest disgrace imaginable to Jerusalem itself. It should be remembered, that all the sacred writers, (with very little exception,) belonged to Zion, or that despised nation which met to worship at Zion; and no nation on earth, or part of a nation, has been preserved or delivered from idolatry, but through the revelation which God made by the prophets and apostles of Israel!

V. 6. Writeth. ‘When he calleth by his word them into his church, whom he hath elected and written in his book.’ Or rather, the Lord will number up at the last day all the true children of the church; show the eminence and excellency of their characters; and contrast them with all that the world hath admired and celebrated in ungodly men.

V. 7. The literal version seems to be, “They shall sing, as those that lead up the dance,” that is, most joyfully: and the burden of the song will be, “All my springs are in thee.” (Horne.) ‘The prophet setteth his whole affections and comfort in the church.’ The Psalmist himself evidently decides for the church, and against the world; because all the springs of life and salvation are in the church, and none elsewhere. For “the LORD dwelleth in Zion,” as “God in Christ reconciling the world unto himself:” and from his fulness all believers in every age, “have received;” as “drawing water with joy from the wells of salvation.” Perhaps the singing and music at the sanctuary were mentioned, as external expressions of that joy and praise, which would most abound in the church after the coming of the Messiah.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We ought to build all our hopes on that Foundation on which God hath built his church, and his whole plan of manifesting the glory of all his perfections in complete harmony: and “other foundation can no man lay, than that is laid, even Jesus Christ.” They who build on this holy foundation, thence derive sanctifying grace, and become a holy temple and priesthood, offering spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God through him. Public worship, properly conducted, is most honourable, and therefore most acceptable to the Lord; and ought not by any means to be neglected by those who would be accounted denizens of the city of our God. And when we consider the glorious things which are spoken of her pleasant situation, her holy temple, her royal palaces, her fortifications, her righteous King, and his wise, just, and merciful government, the character of her inhabitants, and all their privileges, immunities, and durable advantages, we can do no other than desire to be enrolled among her citizens.—After all the encomiums that have been lavished on the heroes, statesmen, orators, poets, and philosophers, of which Egypt, China, Greece and Rome, and all other nations have boasted; impartiality must allow, that the despised church of God hath produced an illustrious and numerous catalogue of worthies, who have done vastly more to render mankind wiser, holier, and happier, than all that have appeared on earth besides. They are therefore justly deserving of superior esteem, applause, and gratitude. But no one expects that they will receive due honour, who reflects how the Son of God, and his prophets and his apostles were treated, as they severally appeared on earth, and performed their respective services to mankind. But in the records of heaven the meanest of those who are born again stand registered: the Lord himself, when he writeth up the people, will allow them all the privileges of citizens of Zion, and honour them before the assembled world: and this honour and happiness alone are worthy of the ardent desires of all men, in every age and every clime. For the Highest himself shall establish Zion: a vast and eternal revenue of praise will redound to him from his church of re-deemed sinners, and their joy to eternity shall equal their largest capacities. All the springs of consolation are in the church alone: and they, who draw not from these wells of salvation, will most certainly be for ever put off with broken cisterns that can hold no water.

NOTES.

PSALM LXXXVIII. Title. Heman the Ezrahite, so distinguished according to the general opinion of learned men as a descendant of Zerach, the son of Judah, was a different person from Heman the chief singer, in the days of David, who was a Levite. But it is not at all certain, at what time, or on what occasion, the psalm was composed.—Some think the word Leannoth signifies, for dejection, as almost the whole psalm is the emphatic language of the deepest despondency: but others suppose the word to mean no more than that the psalm was to be sung responsively, and that it is merely a musical term.

V. 1, 2. Probably the Psalmist wrote this psalm under great distress of soul, and meant to describe his own case: yet the language unavoidably leads the thoughts of the attentive reader to the Redeemer, who was doubtless intended by the Holy Spirit; and the history of his closing scene forms the best comment upon it. It is called by many a penitential psalm: but there is not one confession of sin or prayer for pardon contained in it; nor one comfortable word, except the address, "O LORD God of my salvation," which may be applied to Christ with reference to his deliverance from his sufferings and enemies. 'Though many cry in their sorrows; yet they cry not earnestly to God for remedy; as he (the Psalmist,) did to him whom he confessed to be the Author of his salvation.'

V. 3. (Notes, xxii. lxi. Matt. xxvi. 36-39.) "Full of troubles," was thy soul; O blessed Jesus, in that dreadful hour, when, under the weight of our sins and sorrows, thou wert sinking into the grave. Let us judge of thy love by thy sufferings, and of both by the impossibility of our fully comprehending them. (Horne.)

V. 4. Christ died, to all appearance, like the rest of mankind; nay, being forcibly put to death as a malefactor,—he seemed in the hands of his executioners "as a man that had no strength." The people shook their heads at him, saying, "He saved others, himself he cannot save." (Horne.)

V. 5. A dead man has done with and is freed from the concerns of this world. So long as he lived, he was the object of God's providential care: but when he is laid in the grave, he seems forgotten and cut off from his hand, that is, until the resurrection. Thus the Psalmist thought that he had done with life, and all its interests, employments, comforts, and cares; and should no more be regarded by Providence than the dead corpses of men slain in battle, and thrown into one common grave, appear to be: and thus Christ, when expiring on the cross, seemed to be deserted and forgotten by God; and when he was laid in the sepulchre, the Jewish rulers concluded that by sealing and guarding his body, they should cause his name and doctrine to be speedily forgotten.

V. 6-9. Many of the emphatical expressions here employed are nearly similar to those which more evidently relate to the sufferings of Christ, in the awful season in which his enemies, urged on by the powers of darkness, nailed him to the cross, insulting him when expiring, and rejoiced when they had shut his body up in the dark and dreadful sepulchre: but, in accession to all that they could do, "it pleased the LORD to bruise him," and to make his "soul a sacrifice for sin; yea, he was made a curse for us." Thus he was laid by the Lord himself, "in the lowest pit, in darkness, in the deeps:" because "the wrath of God lay hard on him, and he was afflicted with all his waves." In the mean while his disciples forsook him, Peter denied him, Judas betrayed him, all were afraid or ashamed to own him; and he was left bound and in confinement without redress; though he just before "had offered up prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears, unto him that was able to save him from death; and was heard, in that he feared."

V. 10-12. It is not to be expected that the dead should arise from the grave, or the soul return from the place of departed spirits, to praise God in his congregations on earth, and celebrate among them his power, truth, and mercy: and therefore the Psalmist may seem to plead for present deliverance, as Hezekiah and many others did. But considering the psalm as the language of our suffering Redeemer, these verses may be explained as his earnest prayer to be carried through his arduous work; that "his soul might not be left in hell, nor his flesh see corruption;" but that he might make known to men the way of salvation, to the praise of God's power, mercy, and truth; and as the first-fruits of the resurrection, not only preserve their souls from destruction, but also raise their bodies from the grave, that land of darkness and forgetfulness. The word rendered destruction, is Abaddon, which St. John gives as the name of the devil, that great destroyer. It seems therefore to denote the pit of destruction, as the other words do the grave. Without the mercy of God in Christ, the bodies of all sinners must have finally been left in the grave, and their souls in hell: For "He is the Resurrection and the Life."

V. 13. "Thus I cry in the anguish of my soul, which keeps me awake, to present my prayers unto thee before the morning-light." (Bp. Patrick.)

PSALM LXXXIX.

The Psalmist praises God for his covenanted mercies to David: celebrating

V. 14. Castest off? “About the ninth hour Jesus cried ^a with a loud voice,—My God, my God, why hast thou ^b forsaken me?”

V. 15. By a trivial change in the pointing, this verse may be rendered, “I am afflicted and expiring: from my youth I suffer thy terrors; I am distracted.” “I am now in the greatest anguish and about to expire. From my youth, I looked forward to this dreadful season, knowing what I had to endure from thy wrath against the sins of men. Thus I have been a man of sorrows all my life. And I am now so distressed, that I am at a loss what to do.” The original words in the Gospel of St. Mark, respecting our Lord’s agony in the garden, seem exactly to convey the meaning of the word here rendered distracted. (Mark xiv. 33.) He was filled with amazement, horror, anguish, and dejection, beyond all utterance and conception.

V. 16, 17. “He was cut off from the land of the living.” “It pleased the Lord to bruise him.” “He spared not his own Son.” The terrors that pursued, and environed, and overwhelmed the suffering Redeemer, in that hour and power of darkness, cannot be known, even by those who know most of “the terrors of the Lord.”

V. 18. “His disciples and acquaintance were put far from him; they “all forsook him and fled,” to hide themselves from the fury of the Jews, “in darkness,” that is, in secret places.” (Horne.) But the darkness and distress of their minds at this doleful crisis, seem likewise to have been predicted.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The sacred Scriptures, if carefully investigated, will continually remind us of the apostle’s words: “Lay aside every weight,—and run with patience the race set before you; looking unto Jesus, who for the joy set before him endured the cross and despised the shame.” When his life drew nigh unto the grave, his soul was full of trouble; and his gloom was as deep as could consist with the perfect exercise of faith, and hope, and love. The enmity and insult of those who “counted him with them “that go down into the pit” of destruction, and despised him as one deprived of strength and help; his confinement, bonds, and stripes, and dying pains; the treachery, cowardice, and neglect of his disciples, professed friends, and acquaintance, who either stood aloof from his sufferings, or turned away from him as an abomination, while his enemies compassed him about like floods of water, and all the hosts of hell assaulted his soul; formed a vast aggregate of sufferings, beyond what human language can express. But the wrath of God infused the greatest bitterness into his cup: this lay hard upon him, and weighed him down into “the lowest pit, into darkness and the deeps.” The very prospect of this indignation afflicted him, and made him ready to die, from his youth up: and when he actually suffered these terrors he was as one distracted. Still however, the Redeemer cried day and night unto his heavenly Father, and stretched out his hands unto him, as in the utmost extremity of distress: in his agony he prayed more earnestly, and his prayer was indeed heard and accepted; (Heb. v. 7;) though he seemed to be cast off, and no more remembered than a dead man who is laid in the grave. Yet there was no reason for the Saviour’s unequalled sorrows, in any part of his own conduct: perfectly free from sin himself, and infinitely dear to his heavenly Father, “he was wounded for our transgressions,” and bare the heavy wrath of God due to our sins. Whilst therefore we hear him plead to be delivered and exalted, that he might show forth the loving-kindness, righteousness, faithfulness, and wonderful works of God, in the salvation of his people: let us consider what our case would have been, if we had been left to bear this wrath of God for ourselves; or what they will endure who neglect such great salvation; that we may know the value of his love, and feel the vastness of our obligations. And should any of us wretched sinners be left to experience anguish of spirit, terrors of conscience, and horrible temptations; should we suffer tribulation from the world, in such various forms, and with so many embittering circumstances, as to be constrained to appropriate some of the expressions of this doleful psalm: still let us remember, that we are not yet in the depths of hell; and may therefore yet hope in the Lord God of salvation. Let us persevere in earnest prayer, and plead the glory which will arise to him from saving us rather than from destroying us; whilst we desire to be monuments of his mercy, that we may be employed in celebrating his praises. Let us remember, that every affliction comes from his hand, from whom alone we expect relief; and that all creatures are his instruments. Let us not yield to impatience or to despair; but still expect a day of comfort after the darkest and most tedious nights of temptation. And even if we should be forced to conclude one prayer after another, without a glimpse of encouragement, let us begin again, and still hope against hope; and we shall at length prevail. But if we are exempted from such dreadful trials, let us bless the Lord for it, and sympathize with, and pray for, our afflicted and tempted brethren.

NOTES.

PSALM LXXXIX. Title. Many learned men are of opinion that this psalm was written during the Babylonish captivity, when, the family of David being entirely dethroned, the promises of God seemed to be made void: but if it were composed at so late a period, no account can be given why it was ascribed to Ethan the Ezrahite. Indeed, it seems to contain internal evidence that it belongs to earlier times: for none of the deliverances vouchsafed to the kings or people of Judah, after the days of David, are mentioned in it: and the Psalmist, in complaining of the degraded and deplorable condition of David's family, is silent as to the desolations of Jerusalem, and the temple, and the captivity and dispersion of the people; which the psalms evidently relating to Nebuchadnezzar's devastations particularly insist upon. It seems therefore to have been written on occasion of some events, in which the honour and power of the kings of David's race were fallen and apparently ruined; but without either the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, or the captivity of the people: and what period so exactly suits this view of the subject as the reign of Rehoboam? Ten of the tribes of Israel had revolted from him; Jeroboam, the king placed over them, was his powerful adversary; and Shishak, king of Egypt, so entirely reduced and impoverished him, that he only seems to have retained the kingdom by the clemency, and perhaps contempt, of his haughty conqueror. It is probable, that Ethan the Ezrahite lived in the reign of Solomon; and if he survived him, and witnessed these events, (after having seen the glory and power of Solomon's kingdom;) it would be very natural for him to lament the change in the language made use of towards the close of the psalm. As the preceding psalm, ascribed to Heman, seems to have been occasioned by his private trials and distresses, and yet was an evident prophecy of the sufferings of Christ: perhaps this psalm, occasioned by the calamities which had befallen David's race, may likewise be considered as a prophecy of the afflictions and persecutions, to which the Christian Church has been exposed, especially the triumphs of the Roman Antichrist.

V. 1—4. The Psalmist, being about to deplore the apparent failure of the covenant made with David, begins with praising the mercies and faithfulness of God, which he desired to make known to all future generations. Indeed he was assured that his words, being dictated by the Holy Spirit, would continue through all generations, as a testimony to this effect. For he had said, and he would not retract it, however appearances might then be, that the mercy, of which the foundation had been laid in the covenant with David, would be built up for ever; and that God's faithfulness to his promises would be established in the heavens, or like them, that is, above the reach of the changes which take place in this lower world. These emphatical expressions are literally verified in the kingdom of Christ, the promised Seed of David, whose throne is established in heaven, and whose true subjects will all be exalted thither. The Psalmist then introduces ГЕHOVAH himself declaring the purport of this covenant with his chosen servant David and his posterity. (Marg. Ref.) "I will be his Father, and he shall be my Son." "These words are cited by the apostle (Heb. i. 5.) as spoken of Christ, to evince his superiority over the angels. Yet that the whole passage does, in the letter, relate to Solomon, can admit of no doubt; he being the seed and immediate successor of David, and appointed to "build an house for God's name." Here then we have an incontestible proof that the covenant with David had Messiah for its object; that Solomon was a figure of him; and that the Scripture has sometimes a double sense." (Horne.)

V. 5. Notwithstanding present difficulties, the Psalmist was confident that God would perform such wonders in fulfilling his covenant, as would excite the praises of all the inhabitants of heaven, as well as cause his saints on earth in their assemblies to celebrate his faithfulness.

d 16, 17. xx. 1. 5. xci. 14. 1 Sam. ii. 1. John xvii. 6. 11. 26.

V. 6—12. The majesty, holiness, wisdom, and power of God, (infinitely excelling all the endowments of the noblest creatures,) demand the reverential fear of all the assembled saints on earth, and of the angels who surround his throne in heaven ; and accordingly all the holy worshippers in heaven dread his indignation, stand in awe of him, and worship with the most profound veneration of his manifested glory : and his saints on earth ought, in the same spirit, to wait the event of their difficulties and trials. By his power he would certainly manifest his faithfulness : as he ruleth and boundeth the raging ocean, which none else can govern ; so would he restrain the progress of those enemies who seemed about to swallow up his church with irresistible force and fury. As he had formerly broken Rahab, (or Egypt,) and delivered his people, and afterwards crushed the nations of Canaan ; so with his strong arm he was able to scatter their present enemies : and being the Creator and Proprietor of heaven and earth, and having chosen Israel as his people ; he would certainly make that land in all its parts (which Tabor and Hermon, two distant mountains, represented,) to rejoice in his name and resound with his praise.

V. 14. Habitation. Or establishment, or basis. JEHOVAH's throne is established in justice and judgment : his almighty power and sovereign authority are always exercised in perfect justice and wisdom, and in entire consistency with his mercy and truth ; and these mark out the path in which he walketh with his people. 'Thou dost not rule the world merely by thy absolute power ; but hast placed thy principal glory in justice and equity, mercy and fidelity, from which thou never swervest.' (Bp. Patrick.) (Note, Psalm xxv. 10.)

V. 15—18. (Notes, &c. Lev. xxv. Num. x. 2—10.) The sound of the sacred trumpets calling the people to their solemn feasts, and announcing the year of Jubilee, seems here alluded to. If the difference between that typical dispensation and the clear light of Christianity be duly considered ; it will be allowed, that they who attentively hear, who understand, believe, and obey the Gospel, who experience its efficacy upon their hearts, and bring forth the fruits of it in their lives, are the people that know the joyful sound. Such persons walk in the comfort of God's manifested presence and favour ; they rejoice in his name, or perfections, as their security and felicity : they are "made the righteousness of God in Christ," and even the justice of God ensures their exaltation ; they glory in him as their Strength, and give him the glory of all they are enabled to do ; and his favour will exalt them above all their enemies, and be their ornament and honour : for they are now the subjects of the Holy One of Israel, their King, and entitled to his protection.—The old translation renders the eighteenth verse more literally, "For our shield ap-
"pertaineth to the Lord, and king, to the Holy One of "Israel." "Though the kings of David's race be at present enfeebled and unable to defend us : yet their cause, as placed over the people of God, is his cause, and he will not suffer it to be permanently run down. The LORD, the Holy One of Israel, will take care of our king, that he may be the shield of his true worshippers." (Note, 2 Chron.
xiii. 4—12.)

V. 19—37. Samuel seems to be here meant as the holy one, or the saint and prophet of God, to whom He spake, in vision respecting David, for “holy men of God” spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.” The Lord had made trial of several others to govern his people, but had laid them aside again. After Saul’s rejection, he found David and chose him from among the people, and endued him with courage and might, that he might exalt him to the throne, and lay help upon him for the deliverance and prosperity of Israel: but especially, that he might be a type of Christ, that Mighty One, who in human nature is chosen and qualified to fill the mediatorial throne, for the salvation of his people. The Lord by the hands of Samuel anointed David with the holy oil; not only as an emblem of the graces and gifts conferred upon him; but as a type of Christ, the King, Priest, and Prophet, which the Father provided for us, and anointed with the Holy Spirit without measure. After David was anointed, he was exposed to severe trials and persecutions, especially from Saul, that son of wickedness: but none could obtain any advantage against him, either by policy or power; for the Lord powerfully established and strengthened him, and finally made him victorious over every enemy, and brought terrible plagues on those who hated him. He also established his authority over Israel, and extended his dominion from the Mediterranean Sea to the Euphrates: and while David adhered to the worship of the Lord, as “his Father, his God, and the Rock of his salvation:” he was treated as his first-born or favourite son, and made more honourable than the kings of the earth. Yet all this was but a faint shadow of the Redeemer’s sufferings, deliverance, and consequent glory and authority, in whom alone all these predictions and promises are fully accomplished. The promises of the covenant to the posterity of David were in some measure performed to Solomon, and to the long succession of kings which reigned over Judah till the captivity: yet in Christ and in his spiritual seed, they have their complete accomplishment. From the Redeemer and his church, which is one with him, the loving-kindness of the Father will never be utterly removed. God hath pledged the honour of his own holiness, that he will exactly perform the covenant made with Christ, whom David typified. So that the Saviour and his church shall remain, as the sun and moon, to the end of time, and continue, (like the rainbow, “that faithful witness in the heavens,” to the truth of God in his covenant with Noah,) a constant witness that God hath fulfilled his covenant with the Redeemer. (Notes, &c. Gen. ix. 12—17. Isaiah liv. 9, 10.) And as the Lord by various corrections visited upon the posterity of David their transgressions of his law, but did not utterly cut them off, continuing them in regal authority over Judah till the captivity, and afterwards preserving the family till Christ descended from it and received the kingdom: so he will correct his people, but never finally cast them off. No doubt the emphatical language used in the covenant of God with his servant David, as it is here brought together and enlarged on, must have excited in believers at that time very high expectations, which Solomon’s unprecedented prosperity was calculated to confirm: but it is probable that most of them, (like the apostles in respect of the Redeemer’s kingdom,) interpreted the promises in a manner different from their real meaning; and so entertained unwarranted hopes of temporal prosperity, under the kings of David’s line, without duly considering, what had also been repeatedly declared concerning them, in case they forsook the worship of God; and without properly looking forward to Christ the Son of David, in whom all the promises were to have their full accomplishment. (Marg. Ref.) When, therefore, they saw a king of David’s race deprived of a very large part of his dominions; opposed by Jeroboam, vanquished, plundered, and put under tribute by Shishak, in a very short time after Solomon’s death; and perceived little hope of his emerging from his difficulties; it is not at all wonderful, if they were tempted to conclude, that the promises and covenant of God, (though confirmed with an oath by his own holiness, or all his moral perfections,) had failed and would come to nothing. This was the temptation; yet the Psalmist evidently resisted it, strenuously and successfully; and taught his people to do the same.

V. 38—45. ‘Because of the horrible confusion of things, the prophet complaineth unto God, as though he saw not the performance of his promise; and thus discharging his cares on God, he resisteth doubt and patience.’—‘He meaneth the horrible dissipation, and renting of the kingdom under Jeroboam.’—‘He sheweth that the kingdom fell before it came to perfection or was ripe.’—‘In joining prayer with his complaints, he sheweth that his faith never failed.’ When the calamities above mentioned befel Rehoboam, it seemed as if the Lord had been provoked to abhor and cast off his anointed king: the covenant with David appeared to be made void, his crown trampled upon in disgrace, and the divine protection withdrawn. The Israelites spoiled and reproached the house of David, the Egyptians were victorious and triumphant; and in the early days of that royal race, it was put to shame and reduced to the brink of ruin: and how could this consist with the faithfulness of God to his covenant? Doubtless the Psalmist meant to urge this as a plea with him, to return in mercy and restore the family of David to prosperity: and likewise to propose it to the distressed prince and people of Judah, for their instruction; that they might consider the dispensation as a chastisement for their sins, and so be led by it to repentance. And probably he also meant to lead their thoughts to the promised Seed of David, whom the covenant principally respected. ‘When the faithful few beheld the true Son of David—delivered over to a shameful, as well as painful death; they began to think the covenant made void, and the promises at an end. “We trusted,” said they, “that it had been he which should have redeemed Israel.”’ (Horne.)—The early corruption of Christianity by “damnable heresies,” the lamentable schisms which have rent it, and the oppressive persecutions and multiplied corruptions to which it hath so long been exposed, have precisely the same effect on Christians in general, in respect of the promises and predictions concerning an universal propagation and triumph of the Gospel, contained in the sacred Scriptures.

V. 47, 48. The Psalmist here seems to have personated the family of David, or one of the kings of that race, or to have formed the psalm for the use of his afflicted prince. The reigns of David and Solomon were soon over; the glory of their kingdom had been very transient, if it were thus to terminate; and they seemed almost to be made in vain: for the short glimpse of Israel’s prosperity was now extinguished: and indeed as every one must die, if the prosperity of the church depended upon the life of any man, it would soon be buried in his grave. Probably the prophet looked forward to Him, who indeed saw death, and went down into the grave; but was able to deliver his life from the power of it, and rose again, and liveth from age to age to perpetuate the safety and provide for the happiness of his people. With this he might also comfort himself, under the prospect of his own death, though he had survived the external glory of David’s kingdom, and expected soon to die and leave it in disgrace and distress.

V. 51. ‘They laugh at us who wait patiently for the coming of thy Christ.’ ‘They reproached the footsteps of Christ; or the slowness of his footsteps.’ Other constructions are put on this expression: but they do not seem equally satisfactory. We know, however, that the enemies of the family of David, invidiously traced the footsteps of those princes; that is, they examined every part of their conduct, in order to find matter of accusation against them; they overlooked all their eminent services, and aggravated every slip they made, and even reproached them.

PSALM XC.

The Psalmist comforts himself, by considering the favour of the eternal God to his people, 1, 2. He laments the with such things as they had never done; thus they slandered the Anointed of God. Perhaps they also ridiculed the expectations which were formed of returning prosperity to the family of David, and of the Messiah descending from him. We remember also who sought for false witnesses against Jesus the Anointed of God, to put him to death; and persons of the same stamp will revile those who tread in his steps.

V. 52. 'But let them laugh on; neither their scoffs nor ' our calamity shall hinder us from praising the Lord, and ' speaking good of him continually, in assured hope that ' he will at last deliver us. Let it be so, we beseech thee, ' let it be so, as we desire and hope that we may ever ' praise thee for our happy restoration.' (Bp. Patrick.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—18.

When the dispensations of Providence seem contrary to the promises, and we venture to state our difficulties and discouragements before God; we should always recur to first principles, and take it for granted that he is doing right, though we are not able to discern it. Faith in the boundless and everlasting mercy and truth of God brings comfort into the heart, and fills the mouth with praise, even in the deepest scenes of adversity: and whilst we are assured that "mercy shall be built up for ever," and "faithfulness established in the heavens;" we should desire that all men, through successive generations, may be acquainted with them, and praise the Lord for them. His covenant with the seed of David his servant is immutably ratified; for the throne of David "is builded to all generations," yea, for ever and ever: and all the inhabitants of Heaven, as well as the congregations of saints on earth, will continually praise the wonders of his power displayed in performing the engagements of his word.—We should be careful never to speak or act as if we thought any of the angels in heaven, or any of the sons of the mighty on earth, fit to be compared unto the Lord. He is not limited to such methods as we can conceive; or to such operations as creatures can perform. His thoughts and ways are infinitely above our comprehension; and our part is to adore the depths we cannot fathom, and to expect covenanted blessings when we can see no way in which they can be communicated. Our "God is greatly " to be feared, even in the assembly of his saints, and " to be had in reverence of all them that are about him." Nor should our filial confidence in his love abate our awful veneration of his Majesty; for then, our worship on earth would bear no resemblance to that of angels in heaven:

frailty, sufferings, and shortness of human life, as the effects of the wrath of God against the sins of men, 3—11. He prays that these considerations may be wisely improved by him and his people; for the comforts of God's mercy: and for a sensible experience of his power, glory, and favour with them and their children, 12—17.

(Notes, Is. vi.) Surely then our external posture and serious attention should indicate the reverence of our hearts, when we assemble to worship our glorious God. But, alas, how little of this appears in general in our congregations! and how much cause of humiliation have we all on this account?—It is a joyful consideration, that the power which created and upholds the earth, and which rules the impetuous waves of the sea, is engaged to perform the promises; and that the Proprietor of the universe is the Portion of his people. That high and strong right hand and mighty arm, which smote Egypt, will to the end scatter the enemies of his Church; and all who trust in his mercy shall rejoice in his name: for as justice and judgment are the stability of his throne, so mercy and truth direct all his dealings towards his believing servants. Happy then are they who know, believe, and obey the joyful sound of his Gospel; for their present safety and their eternal felicity are secured in the favour of Him whom they trust as a Saviour, love as a Father, and obey as a King.

V. 19—37.

The Lord hath spoken by his prophets and apostles, in divers times and various ways, with an especial purpose of making known to sinful men that He "hath laid help " upon one that is mighty, and exalted one chosen out " of the people;" who being infinite in power and love as the eternal Son of God, and having become one of us by assuming our nature, "is not ashamed to call us brethren." This is the Redeemer, whom JEHOVAH himself hath appointed for us, and who alone is adequate to the arduous work of our salvation. Having been anointed immeasurably with the Holy Spirit, and strengthened by the power of God, He in our nature withstood and repelled the combined assaults of earth and hell; and is now exalted by the right hand of the "Father to be a Prince and Saviour, " to give repentance and forgiveness of sins," and to beat down and destroy all that hate his disciples. In the name of JEHOVAH his horn is exalted, and mercy and truth come through and by him to the ruined sons of men; and his kingdom shall extend throughout the whole earth. He, in a peculiar sense, could cry unto the Lord, "Thou " art my Father, my God, and my strong Salvation:" being indeed his first-begotten, his only begotten Son, and made, even in our nature, far higher than the kings of the earth. With him the everlasting covenant is ratified for evermore, and through him alone is mercy exercised towards the guilty. "His dominion shall be for ever, " and his throne as the days of heaven." Whilst he invites sinners to incline their ear and come to him, that he may make with them this everlasting covenant; he treats all his willing subjects as his friends and children: and the oath with which that covenant is ratified to him, as the Seed of Abraham, and the Son of David, is recorded, in order "that we might have strong consolation who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us:" and the name of God would be dishonoured, if this security could possibly fail, or the thing be once altered which he hath spoken. So that the whole church of Christ, as his spiritual seed, is secured in its immunities and privileges by the covenant made and ratified with its glorious Head. Let us then seek an interest in these blessings; and an assurance that we belong to this happy company, by the witness of the Holy Spirit in our hearts, as the counterpart of "the faithful record in heaven," of our names written in the book of life; and so rejoice in hope of the glory of God.

V. 38—52.

Notwithstanding the security of the covenant of grace, it is also very plainly foretold that damnable heresies and grievous scandals and corruptions should take place among professed Christians; and when these predictions are compared with what we read and witness, they may serve to confirm our faith, though they grieve our hearts. Indeed even true Christians offend in many things. Hence it is that corrections become necessary, in order to the performance of the covenant to the honour of God. When this is the case, the Lord will visit their transgressions with the rod, and their "iniquity with scourges: nevertheless he will not utterly take away his loving kindness from them, nor suffer his truth to fail." The records of the Lord's dealings with the family of David, hold before us an emblem of his dealings with his church and with believers. Grievous may be the afflictions which they endure; great the disgrace and distress of soul which come upon them: but the gates of hell shall not prevail against the church, neither will God finally forsake or abhor the true believer. We should then rejoice in this security; but we should rejoice with trembling: many self-deceivers abuse the doctrine; and even they who are interested in the blessing, may, notwithstanding, by loose walking, bring themselves into such darkness and distress as can scarcely be conceived. We ought, therefore, to rely on it for our encouragement in the path of duty, and in bearing the cross, and not when yielding to sloth and self-indulgence. Neither should we give way to despondency, whilst we witness the success of idolatry, superstition, heresy, or infidelity against the religion of Christ. These early began to corrupt or to oppose the church: and their success seems often to make void the covenant and profane the Redeemer's crown, to break down the strong holds of his royal city, and to expose his religion to reproach. But though his cause may appear to suffer loss and his glory to be eclipsed, and his enemies to conquer and triumph, yet this will be only for a time. The Lord will not hide himself for ever, nor suffer his wrath to burn like fire, whatever his people fear, or his enemies expect. But when his purposes are effected, he will return, cause his servants to rejoice, and put his enemies to silence and shame. For the Saviour ever liveth to effect his grand designs, and a thousand years are in his sight but as one day; and though one instrument after another die, and effect very little; though we are all shortly to drop into the grave, and may perhaps leave the church under a thick cloud; and though all men seem made in vain: yet the Lord himself will surely arise and plead his own cause, and fulfil his largest promises in their fullest meaning. If, then, we can do little else during our few remaining days on earth, let us give ourselves unto prayer: let us plead with the Lord his former mercies to his people, and the promises of his word: let us humbly represent before him the reproach cast upon his servants by his enemies, through the prevalence of impiety in the visible church, and through the apparent delay of his making his truth universally triumphant. And though the blasphemies and slanders of the proud and mighty, who revile or ridicule those who expect the coming of the Lord's anointed King, and walk in his footsteps, must needs grieve our hearts: yet let us still hope for the commencement of a more glorious scene on earth, as well as for eternal felicity in heaven; and in the prospect of these approaching seasons of joy and praise, let us now mix our tears and prayers with hallelujahs, and still say from our hearts, "Blessed be the LORD for ever—more, Amen, and Amen."

NOTES.

PSALM XC. Title. "Moses, the man of God," (the prophet Moses, and not one of the same name in after ages, as some imagine,) may very reasonably be supposed to have composed this most instructive and affecting psalm, when the generation of Israel, which God had by him brought out of Egypt, was sentenced to fall in the wilderness, or when he had witnessed in a great degree the execution of that sentence. (Notes, &c. Num. xiii. xiv.:) and it is not improbable that it was used at the tabernacle, as well as published among the people, during that solemn season, when death marched his rounds among them in so remarkable a manner. It seems to have been preserved along with the books of Moses, and afterwards to have been inserted in the book of Psalms. To obtain the most interesting view of this picture, so to speak, we must consider Moses as the principal figure, and carefully advert to his peculiar circumstances at that season. The sentiments indeed of the psalm are never unsuitable to our situation in this world: but they would be peculiarly adapted to the case of a pious man, in a time of pestilence, when tens of thousands were swept away on every side of him.

V. 1, 2. The Israelites were shut up in the desert, and not allowed to find habitations in the promised land: but the Psalmist recollected, that even Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, were strangers and pilgrims in Canaan. Indeed God himself had in all ages been the Home, Rest, Safety, and Comfort of his people: and into that Dwelling-place they might enter by faith and prayer, even in the wilderness; seeing He was the same almighty, merciful, and faithful God from everlasting to everlasting.

V. 3—6. When man sinned, his Creator sentenced him "to return to the dust from whence he was taken." Adam, however, and several of his descendants, lived almost a thousand years: but in the sight of the eternal God this was but as yesterday; and it was soon past like a watch, or three hours of the night, which glides away while men sleep. Thus the Lord turned them to destruction, as well as their more short lived posterity; and the human race had all along been swept away by death as by an impetuous torrent: life appeared but a sleep; and all earthly prosperity only resembled the verdure and variegated hues of the meadow in the summer's morning; which before night is cut down by the scythe, and withered by the sun. The words translated, "Thou carriest them away as with a flood," may be rendered, "Thou overflowedst them;" and be considered as a reference to the desolations of the general deluge.

V. 7—10. The Israelites had provoked the Lord, by their unbelief and rebellion, to swear in his wrath that they should not enter Canaan: and this passage may refer to those events. Accordingly they were swept away by the wrath of God, in so extraordinary a manner, that they were kept in constant trouble of mind by the dread of his judgments. (Marg. Ref.) Not only were their open transgressions awfully punished; but their secret sins, or the iniquities of their youth, (as some render the word,) were called to remembrance by their righteous Judge. Thus their days and years were turned away from hope and comfort by the wrath of God, spent to little purpose, and soon came to an end, as a tale, a meditation, a waking dream. Perhaps the lives of men in general were at this æra reduced to about the present limits: at least it was thus with that generation of Israel; few of whom would exceed, and most would come short of, eighty years. But the verses are equally applicable to the general state of human nature.

V. 11. This verse is thus rendered by several learned men, "Who knoweth the power of thy anger? or of thy 'wrath, according as thou art terrible?' That is, 'Who is there that fears the wrath of the Almighty in proportion to the degree in which it ought, in all reason, to be dreaded? or in proportion to his fear of mortal men, when possessed of power? Who is sufficiently afraid of offending God; or earnest in seeking to be reconciled to him?' 'According as men do more or less tremble at thy judgments; so dost thou more or less execute them.' (Hall.)

V. 12. The shortness, uncertainty, and sorrows of life, as the effects of the powerful wrath of God against the sins of men, when considered in connexion with the doctrine of an eternal state of future retribution, and that of salvation by the mercy and grace of God, through the promised Redeemer, if duly laid to heart, are suited to teach men true wisdom: and Moses prayed, that he and all his people, might be taught by the Lord himself thus to lay them to heart.

PSALM XCI.

The believer's security under the divine protection, amidst enemies and dangers, 1—10. Angels charged to take care of him, 11, 12. Promises to him who loves, knows, and trusts in God, 13—16.

V. 13—17. The Israelites, notwithstanding their transgressions, were externally the Lord's people, and he had many faithful servants among them. These no doubt thought the time very long, during which they continued under the severe rebukes of their God, without the accustomed tokens of his favour. They therefore prayed, that for their sakes he would at length change his conduct towards the nation: and if the sentence respecting Canaan was irreversible, that he would without delay satisfy their souls with the comforts of his mercy and grace; which would enable them to spend their few remaining days in holy joy, and counterbalance their long continued afflictions. They further besought the Lord that he would cause them again to witness his works of power and mercy for them, as an earnest of those more glorious displays which were to be afforded to their children, and that "the beauty of the Lord their God might be upon them." This implies a request that he would appear to them in his tabernacle, the beautiful sanctuary: that he would continue his ordinances among them, which were their glory and beauty; and especially, that he would shine upon them with the beams of his holiness, (which is his beauty,) that, like the moon, irradiated and beautified by the reflected beams of the sun, they might be made to shine in the beauty of holiness as derived from him. Thus Moses and Aaron especially desired that the Lord would prosper and establish their work; that their pious and zealous endeavours might have their full effect by rendering the Israelites a holy and a happy people; which would best prepare them for the conquest of Canaan, and for the blessings which God had engaged to bestow on the nation. 'Except thou guide with thine Holy Spirit, our enterprises can have no good success.'

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The favour and protection of God are the only suitable rest and comfort of the soul in this evil world: and in Christ Jesus he is become the Refuge and Dwelling-place, to which we may repair whenever pursued by the accusations of conscience or the unkindness of men; when wearied with the cares and toils of life; or disquieted by sickness and the prospect of death. His truth, love, and power are eternal and immutable; and this habitation can never fail those who, from age to age, resort to it for rest and peace. Compared with him who from everlasting to everlasting is God alone, how do the most renowned of the human race shrink into insignificance! The longest life which men have passed on earth, has been but as a watch of the night; and then the word of the Almighty remanded their bodies to their original dust. What images in nature can then sufficiently illustrate the brevity of our present span of life? the impetuous current of time hurries mortals, as in a sleep, into eternity, where most of them first awake, and lift up their eyes: and all the external splendour and gayety which excite the envy, the desires, or the admiration of the thoughtless beholder, are destroyed and withered as in a moment. So that the supposed pleasure of a worldly life passes as a "tale that is told," and generally, taken all together, it proves a doleful tale. Few in comparison reach the seventy years assigned as the date of man's present life; and if a small number linger out a longer space, their lives are but a continuation of labour and sorrow, and soon they are cut off and fly away. But wherefore hath the Lord, as it were, made all men thus in vain? To this inquiry the scriptural, and the only rational, answer is, that we are a company of condemned criminals, and are thus troubled and consumed by his anger; he has his eye upon our most secret sins, as well as our more open iniquities; and therefore we pass our days away in his deserved wrath. The sentence of temporal death is gone forth, and is irreversible, however the time and circumstances of it may vary. This indeed is very little compared with the wrath to come: yet, alas, how few seem to understand or regard the powerful wrath of that God who is able to destroy both body and soul in hell; though no apprehensions can possibly equal the terror of it! Instead then of wasting our precious fleeting days in pursuing the phantoms of the world, which elude our grasp, and will leave their possessors for ever poor, we should employ ourselves in seeking forgiveness of sins and an inheritance in heaven. Let us earnestly pray, that the Lord would so teach us to consider the shortness and uncertainty of life, and the proportion of it which is already past, that we may apply our hearts to this true wisdom. A proper attention to this "one thing needful" will prove us wise to eternity, whatever else be renounced or neglected: but inattention to it will stigmatize us as fools for ever, though we should gain the whole world. If this grand interest be safe, the shortness of life may rather be matter of mutual congratulation than condolence: and as to the evils that we feel or witness, persevering prayer will prevail either for a mitigation of them, or comfort under them. Whatever else be withheld, the mercy and favour of our God will satisfy our souls: and in communion with him we may rejoice and be glad all our days, even in this miserable world. 'These are the days wherein God afflicteth us, these the years in which we see evil: but he will make us glad according to them. "These light afflictions which are but for a moment, work for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." 'Then shall our joy be increased, and receive an additional relish from the remembrance of our former sorrows; then shall we bless the days and years which exercised our faith, and perfected our patience: and then shall we bless God who chastised us for a season, that he might save us for ever.' (Horne.) In the mean while, we should lay ourselves out to do what good we can in this evil world to those around us, and especially to such as are likely to survive us; earnestly and constantly praying, that the work of redeeming love may be more and more made known, in its glory and efficacy, to our souls; that we may more fully experience the sanctification and consolation of the Holy Spirit; that the beauty of holiness, even the divine image, may be evidently visible in all our character and conduct; that the same blessings in still larger proportion may be extended to our children and more remote posterity; that the Lord would “establish the works of our hands upon us;” and that he would illuminate his church with the light and beauty of his truth and purity, and establish the Redeemer’s kingdom and work throughout the whole earth.

NOTES.

PSALM XCI. V. 1, 2. It is probable, that David wrote this psalm, though his name is not prefixed to it. “The secret place of the Most High,” may be an allusion to the ark of the covenant, fixed in the most holy place as in a secret pavilion. By faith and prayer, believers put themselves under the protection of God, relying on his power, wisdom, truth, and love; and thus they dwell in an invisible fortress, and are secured by an almighty Friend, in a way kept secret from the unbelieving world around them. Whilst the Psalmist recommended this Refuge and Rest to others, he avows his purpose to avail himself of it, and to place his entire confidence in the Lord. The two verses, however, may be thus rendered, “He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High, shall lodge under the shadow of the Almighty; saying of the Lord, My Refuge, &c.” In every dark season of affliction and danger, he shall have security and comfort, while with his heart he relies on the Almighty, and with his lips avows that his expectation is from him alone.

V. 3—8. Under a variety of expressions, in the most beautiful style of eastern poetry, the Psalmist represents the manifold dangers to which believers are exposed from the wickedness of men, and from pestilences and diseases in all their multiplied forms. Yet these are but a shadow of the perils by which their souls are threatened from the subtlety and power of Satan, the plausible delusions of false teachers, the terrors of persecutors, the allurements of flattery and prosperity, the infectious wickedness of the world, and the deceitfulness of their own hearts. “But God’s help is ever ready for us, whether Satan assail us secretly, or openly: that is, his faithful keeping of his promise.” The Septuagint renders the clause, “the destruction that wasteth at noon-day,” “the noon-day demon.” “Avarice and ambition are abroad in the day; while concupiscence as a pestilence walketh in darkness.” In adversity the soul is disturbed by terrors, in prosperity still more endangered by pleasures. But Jesus Christ hath overcome the world to prevent us from being overcome by it. (Horne.) Yet, as thousands and ten thousands fall, during a fatal pestilence, though others witnessing these desolations are preserved: so immense multitudes are swept into destruction by delusions and temptation, while a few escape to mourn over them. “The godly have some experience of God’s judgments against the wicked even in this life; but fully shall they see it at that day when all things shall be revealed.”

V. 9, 10. These verses are thus rendered in the old version. “For thou hast said, the Lord is mine hope; thou hast set the Most High for thy Refuge. There shall be no evil, &c.” Because this is thy avowed and real confidence, therefore thou art safe.

V. 11, 12. The Lord is pleased to employ the ministration of his holy angels, for the protection of his people from outward harm while in the path of duty; but if they desert their post and path, they are not warranted to depend on that protection: and (not angels, but) the Holy Spirit must inwardly guide them in those ways, or bring them back when they wander. The mutilated and sophistical quotation which Satan made of this text, in tempting our Saviour, may show that Christ was principally, but not exclusively, meant. (Notes, Matt. iv.)

V. 13. By these figurative expressions, Satan and his progeny of wicked men are figuratively described, who persecute the people of God, or attempt to terrify, or seduce them from their duty, but over whom they shall at length triumph as their Captain hath triumphed. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 14—16. ‘To assure the faithful of God’s protection, ‘He bringeth in God himself to confirm the same.’ So that JEHOVAH himself is here introduced as the speaker; and the persons intended are characterized. They have known the name of the Lord, and set their love on him, expecting their happiness from him, and seeking help from him in prayer: these characters He will deliver, honour, exalt, and satisfy with long life, if not here, yet in heaven, where he will show them his complete salvation. Even the promises of Scripture imply that “in this world the best of Christians must have tribulation;” by engaging that the Lord will afford them his gracious presence under their troubles and trials.

The following view of this beautiful psalm, with an interchange of speakers, which has been transmitted to me, seems worthy of consideration. ‘Imagine the Psalmist to ‘have been addressing himself to some person hopefully ‘disposed towards religion, in sentiments and language, of ‘which the first verse affords a specimen: this person being ‘much affected and confirmed in his religious purposes by ‘the discourse, comes to the resolution of the second verse, ‘I will say, &c.’ Encouraged and excited by this success, ‘the Psalmist resumes the conversation, and in yet more ‘animated strains sets forth the security and blessedness of ‘the man “whose hope the LORD is.” “Surely” (if you ‘do so,) “he will deliver, &c.” The Almighty himself, ‘at the fourteenth verse, assumes the part of the speaker, ‘and confirms all that his servant had urged, and thus the ‘psalm concludes.’

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The divine protection and consolation which believers enjoy, are deemed visionary by ungodly men: but they really do abide and repose under the shadow of the Almighty, which the scorching sun of tribulation cannot penetrate, and in a fortress which no power of the enemy can force. Let then sinners come to him upon his mercy-seat, through the Redeemer’s name: and let those who have experienced his salvation, boldly avow their confidence in him, and encourage others also to trust in him. Every man must perceive, that in this world we are exposed to innumerable evils and perils, from which no prudence, courage, or strength of our own can secure us: and it must be allowed desirable to have an Almighty, Omnipresent, and Omniscient Protector, who is likewise infinite in goodness, mercy, and truth: One that can preserve our lives from famine, pestilence, and sudden death; from the desolations of war, the open assaults of robbers and murderers; from the dark designs of false accusers and perjured persons; and from innumerable evils, to which we are exposed by day and by night. But they who violate the commands and neglect the salvation of the Lord, cannot possibly have any well grounded confidence in his protection: and should he bear with their provocations, and continue their lives for many years, yet except they repent they must at length perish in their sins. He therefore who is aware of his real situation, discovers more formidable evils to which he is exposed. He wants a refuge from the deserved wrath of God, and from the miseries of the eternal world. He needs an effectual and permanent deliverance from Satan, who takes men captive at his will, as the fowler ensnares the unsuspecting bird; who appears as a roaring lion when he excites persecution against the church, or as a subtle serpent and a destructive dragon, when he opposes the faith with seducing lies, vain reasonings, fascinating flatteries, or proffered secular advantages; or when he transforms himself into an angel of light to deceive men with false religion. He wants also protection against the pestilence of a wicked world; that he may not be infected with fashionable or epidemical vices, which form “a destruction that wasteth at the noon-day;” or by any other more silent and unsuspected contagion of example, influence, or false principles, which constitute “a pestilence that walketh in darkness:” nay, he is sensible, that the remainders of corrupt nature often render solitude as dangerous as the world itself can be. He also longs to be delivered from the terror of these evils, and to be assured that he shall not at last perish with the multitudes that are on every side thronging the road to destruction. This security and assurance the Christian seeks as his principal object: being persuaded, that if his eternal interests be safe, the Lord will manage all his inferior and temporal concerns wisely and well; and preserve his life on earth as long as is good for him, to whatever perils it may seem exposed. For his encouragement in this grand concern, he by faith daily looks unto Jesus: he contemplates the beloved Son of God, boldly and patiently marching forward on his perilous and rugged path; entirely preserved from the combined hosts of foes which beset his road, and made completely victorious over them; in no degree entangled by any of Satan’s snares, wounded by any of his fiery darts, or terrified by his furious assaults; and not in the least infected by the pestilence of sin, the contagious love of the world, or the fear of man. He considers the Redeemer upheld by the arm of JEHOVAH, ministered unto by angels, trampling upon the head of Satan, overcoming the world; and triumphing over the king of terrors. He hears the Father say of him, “Because “ he hath set his love upon me, therefore will I deliver him: I will set him on high, because he hath known “ my name,” &c. and whilst he reflects that the Redeemer’s conflicts, sufferings, and exaltation were all intended for the benefit of his true disciples; he finds himself animated with a holy courage, to deny himself and take up his cross, and follow him. Relying on the truth and mercy of God, through the Saviour’s great atonement, he hath come to put his trust under the shadow of his wings; and to shelter his soul under his word, as his shield and buckler: he now knows the name of the Lord, and has seen some beams of his glory: he hath set his affections on things above, and given his heart unto the Lord, and desires to love him more and more: he now lives by faith, and daily calls upon the Lord for all he wants. Dangers, temptations, fears, and troubles make him more to prize his Refuge and Rest. In many a sharp conflict he comes off victorious; many a danger he but just seems to escape: thousands go on in sin, or fall away from their profession; yet, by a sort of miracle, he finds himself preserved: no real evil comes upon him, nor is any plague allowed to come nigh his dwelling-place. Often he experiences extraordinary protection in Providence; and he has the comfort to know, that all the angels in heaven are ministering spirits to the heirs of salvation. His chief fear is, lest he should be drawn aside from the path of duty: but he prays to be led and upheld in it, and to be restored with rebukes and corrections if he wander. At length the conflict ends, and he is crowned conqueror, and has done for ever with trouble, sin, and temptation: he is set on high, and honoured in the presence of the angels of God; and “ with his eyes “ shall he behold, and see the reward of the wicked.” O LORD, visit our souls with this salvation, and this length of days even for ever and ever. Amen.

NOTES.

PSALM XCII. Title. The writer of this psalm is not mentioned, and the Jews have many absurd traditions respecting it: but in all probability David composed it, about the time that the ark was conveyed to mount Zion, to be used in the worship at the sanctuary on the sabbath days.

Indeed the sabbath was originally intended to give men leisure and opportunity for contemplating the works of God, and rendering him worship and praise.

V. 1, 2. ‘It is no less delightful than it is profitable to sing hymns, in the praise of the divine perfections, which infinitely transcend all that can be said or thought of them.’ (Bp. Patrick.) The majesty and greatness of God; with his loving-kindness in promising a Saviour and salvation, and his faithfulness in performing his promises, are especially noticed.

V. 3. Harp. Or, With a meditation or song, on the harp. Perhaps the tune is meant. (Marg. Note, 1 Chr. xvi. 4—6.)

V. 4, 5. The wisdom, power, and goodness of God, displayed in the works of creation and providence, are worthy of all admiration and gratitude: and the Psalmist had experienced much of the tender care of the Lord towards him, and perceived many deep contrivances of his wisdom, in all the events of his past life: yet it is probable that he was led by the Holy Spirit to look forward to the great work of redemption by the promised Messiah, as the ground of his hope, the source of his triumph and joy, and the chief subject of his praise.—‘All are too little, O Lord, to express the joy I have in the acts of thy providence, by whom as the world was made, so it is still governed. It ravishes my spirit, and makes me shout for joy, to think, how excellently thou orderest and disposest all things.’ ‘Whose administration, though I cannot fully comprehend; yet I admire—the astonishing greatness of thy works, and reverence the unsearchable depths of thy counsels and designs.’ (Bp. Patrick.)—‘A prospect of creation, in the vernal season, fallen as it is, inspires the mind with a joy, which no words can express: but how doth the regenerate soul exult and triumph at beholding that “work of God’s hands,” whereby he hath created all things anew in Christ Jesus! If we can be pleased with such a world as this, where sin and death have fixed their habitation, shall we not much rather admire those other heavens and that other earth wherein dwell righteousness and life?’ (Horne.)

“ of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness to him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually “discerned.” So that, while the mere sensualist, who, like the brutes, seeks his happiness in animal indulgence, takes no pleasure in contemplating the works of creation and providence, and is incapable of perceiving or admiring the glory of God displayed in them: all other unregenerate, or ungodly men, (the persons denominated fools in Scripture,) are incapable of discerning or delighting in the glorious and harmonious display of the divine perfections in the work of man’s redemption and salvation. And not only the sensualist, but all worldly men in general, being destitute of faith and spiritual discernment, are blind to the tendency and event of ungodly prosperity and pleasure. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10. Fresh oil. Perhaps David might refer, by this expression, to his being re-anointed king upon his accession to the throne. This, however, was only an emblem of the fresh accession of wisdom, strength, and grace, which believers derive continually from the renewed unction of the Holy Spirit.

V. 11. The words my desire are not in the original, or in several versions ancient and modern: and the passage might be read without them, “Mine eyes shall behold mine enemies, and mine ears shall hear of the wicked that “rise up against me.” The Psalmist indeed foresaw their dreadful doom, but it does not follow that he desired it.

V. 12. The palm tree spreads its branches very wide, and grows to a vast size: it affords a refreshing shade to travellers. It also bears dates, a most grateful fruit in those countries, and it is in every way a most beautiful tree, and an invaluable treasure to the inhabitants. The cedar grows immensely large, and flourishes for ages, and when cut down, its valuable timber is exceedingly durable. These trees, compared with the gaudy withering grass, mark and illustrate very forcibly indeed the difference, in character and condition, betwixt the prosperous wicked man and the true believer.

V. 13—15. All holiness and spiritual consolation are derived from the fulness of Christ, through the ordinances of his appointment. The grace which teaches sinners to love and frequent those ordinances, in order to obtain these spiritual blessings, plants them, as “trees of righteousness,” in the courts of the Lord: (Isaiah lxi. 3.) Others, who attend, are but withering branches: but these take root, and derive nourishment from Christ; they grow and flourish, and bear fruit, and are often most eminent in grace and usefulness to others, even amidst the infirmities of old age. This is ordered on purpose to show that the Lord does indeed fulfil his covenant-engagements to all who truly make him the Foundation of their hope, and the Rock of their salvation, (as the Psalmist did;) and is an earnest that he will also perform to them his promise of giving them eternal life.—For there is no unrighteousness or fraud in him; and though his promises were all made of mere grace and mercy; yet, being made, it would not consist with the perfection of his righteousness, in any measure to fail in the performance of them.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

To praise the Lord Most High, and give thanks unto his name, is not only our bounden duty and reasonable service: but it is a most profitable, delightful, and honourable employment, by which we emulate the work of angels, and anticipate the joys of heaven. Yet, whilst we live upon his bounty, and daily experience his loving-kindness and faithfulness, how backward are we in rendering this reasonable and pleasant tribute? We should then stir up ourselves and all around us to join in his praises: and as his truth and mercies are renewed to us by day and by night, we should at least every morning and evening adore his condescension and goodness, and give him thanks for all his benefits; employing every means of rendering the service as solemn and affecting as we can. But on his own day, which we should remember to keep holy, how ought we to abound in praise, in secret, in our families, with our friends, and in the great congregation! For however glorious the works of God in creation and providence are in themselves, or however liberally we are supplied with temporal benefits: none of his operations could give us sinners cause of joy and triumph in him, if it were not for that great work, on this day especially commemorated by Christians; when He, who “died for our sins, was raised “again for our justification.” And if distant views of this great Deliverer so animated the praises of ancient believers; how should we abound in these expressions of exulting gratitude, who enjoy the meridian light of this Sun of Righteousness, which kings, prophets, and righteous men so long desired to see! Well may we say on contemplating the mysteries of redemption, “O LORD, “how great are thy works, and thy thoughts are very

"deep!" For in them angels and arch-angels behold and adore the manifold wisdom and love of God. But how many, who are called Christians, in the arrogant folly of infidelity, or in the brutish stupidity of a licentious and worldly life, despise and disregard, and therefore know nothing of, the glorious displays which God hath made of himself to us! Nor indeed do men, under the clear light of the Gospel, generally understand, that God grants prosperity to wicked men in awful displeasure; and that their momentary flourishing is in order to their being destroyed for ever. Yet, as "the LORD is Most High for evermore," it certainly follows that "all his enemies shall perish," and that all the "workers of iniquity shall be scattered." Let us not then envy their prosperity, but pity their misery, and pray for their conversion: whilst we seek for ourselves the salvation and the grace of the gospel; that being daily anointed with the renewed unction of the Holy Spirit, we may at length be exalted to behold and share our Redeemer's glory, and to witness the ruin of all impenitent sinners, and of those especially who have been our enemies because of our relation to Christ. For the flourishing of the righteous is of a permanent nature: amidst tribulations and temptations they grow in strength of faith and depth of experience, obtain increasing influence, and become fruitful and useful. Such Christians are real blessings to many whilst they live, and even after they are departed; and they themselves shall be most blessed for evermore. Let us then seek to be planted by faith, and rooted by love, "in the courts of the LORD:" that we may flourish, not merely in the leaves and blossoms of knowledge, profession, and discourse, but in the substantial fruits of a holy useful life; and this more and more, as we advance towards the close of our pilgrimage. Let us learn to detest the sentiment of many who profess much zeal for the peculiar doctrines of the gospel, who would persuade us that believers generally grow less zealous as they grow older. It is true that rash, and indiscreet, and ostentatious earnestness will gradually be laid aside, to make way for more simple, humble, prudent zeal and diligence: but a real, evident, and permanent decrease in the substantial fruits of piety and charity, is enough to bring any man's former integrity into question, whatever his profession may have been. Nay, indeed the uprightness and faithfulness of the Lord himself are concerned: the branches of the true Vine which are fruitful, shall be purged, and made more fruitful; (John xv. 2.) But if we have made him the Rock of our salvation, He will make it appear, that there is no unrighteousness in him, by enabling us to go on with increasing delight and fruitful-

NOTES.

PSALM XCIII. V. 1, 2. There is no title to this psalm in the Hebrew; but in the Septuagint it is entitled, 'For the day before the Sabbath, when the earth had been inhabited; An ode of David,' and the Jews have a tradition, that it was composed to be sung on the sixth day of the week, in commemoration of the earth as on that day being completed and replenished with inhabitants. — The great Creator of the world, the eternal JEHOVAH, is the universal and everlasting King and Governor over all his creatures. He is also clothed, or arrayed, not as other kings with costly robes, but with majesty and power incomprehensible, yea, infinite, which appertain to him as self-existent in such a manner that they are absolutely his own; "he hath girded himself with them," and not derived them from any other. And the same power which at the creation established the earth and the whole world, and gave a law that cannot be broken, hath also established the throne of the Creator on an immoveable basis, as necessarily resulting from his own eternity. The government of God, however, over his own people, seems especially intended: and the Jews themselves acknowledge that the stability of the Messiah's kingdom is predicted, and that he is peculiarly meant in this and several of the following psalms. And indeed Immanuel is clothed, and hath girded himself, with majesty and strength; and the power which established the world, establishes also the mediatorial kingdom of the Redeemer, "whose goings forth have been of old, from everlasting." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3, 4. The impetuous torrents of rivers swelled by sudden land-floods, and bearing down all before them with irresistible fury and tremendous noise; and especially "the mighty waves of the sea," during a violent storm, which absolutely baffles description and distances imagination; are the constant emblems of the numerous and powerful enemies which have in every age, by varied means, set themselves furiously and clamorously to oppose the kingdom of God and his Christ: but he who at first set bounds to the proud ocean; who drove back the waters of the deluge to their ancient channel; who divided the Red Sea and Jordan for his people to pass through; who walked on the waves of the sea, and rebuked the winds and waves, saying, "Peace, be still, and there was a great calm;" is higher and more powerful than all

PSALM XCIV.

The Psalmist calls on God to take vengeance on the persecutors of his church, 1—4. He complains of their cruelty and impiety, and sharply reproves their atheistical folly, 5—11. He shows the benefits of affliction, attended by divine teaching; and the security of God's people, 12—15. He calls for helpers against evil-doers, declares his experience of God's goodness, and foretels the destruction of persecutors, 16—23.

“the floods of ungodly men,” who rage against him and his people; as well as “mightier than the noise of many waters,” &c. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5. Revealed truth, and the promises grounded on it, are the testimonies of God, which are very sure, and can never fail. These ensure the safety of the church and the salvation of each believer. In these testimonies and his faithfulness to them, God shows his own holiness; and it becomes, or is the ornament and beauty of, all that belong to his family, to resemble and imitate him in holiness. “The foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his: and, Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity.” (Marg. Ref.) “Sacred and inviolable is the word of our king; sacred and inviolable should be the loyalty of his subjects.” (Horne.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

JEHOVAH might have determined to show his justice, holiness, and awful power alone, in his dealings with the inhabitants of this revolted province of his universal kingdom. But he hath been pleased to make choice of fallen men, for the display of the riches of his mercy, and of the power of his renewing grace. In effecting this great design, the Father hath given all “power in heaven and earth” to his Son, “the second Adam, the Lord from heaven,” who by his humiliation and sufferings hath made atonement for our sins and purchased our salvation. “He is able to save to the uttermost, all those who come to God;” and can not only pardon, but deliver, uphold, and protect, all who trust in him. The combined legions of evil spirits and ungodly men do indeed furiously threaten and assault his kingdom on earth, as the tempestuous waves once did the bark in which Jesus sailed. But he needeth only to arise, and speak with authority, and they will tremble, and desist; as knowing that the Lord on high is mightier than they all. Whilst his sure testimony engages his protection to his church, his true disciples have nothing to fear. But we should all carefully inquire whether his kingdom have indeed been set up in our hearts? This will best be decided by examining, whether we so believe his testimonies and depend on him for salvation, as to be thereby led to love and follow after that holiness, which his precepts command and his example displays, which becometh all who profess the truth, and is bestowed on all his real servants, in a measure on earth, and completely in heaven for ever. (2 Tim. ii. 19.)

NOTES.

PSALM XCIV. V. 1-7. The writer of this psalm is not known; and though some parts of it answer very well to the conduct of Saul and his courtiers, especially in the slaughter, not only of the priests, but of their widows and fatherless children, and also that of the unoffending Gibeonites, (5, 6;) yet it might equally suit many other corrupt times of the Jewish church, and of the Christian also. Whatever persecutions, cruelties, and iniquities, the Psalmist and his pious friends experienced or witnessed; they did not consider themselves as allowed to execute vengeance: but they called on “the God of revenges,” (to whom it belongeth to punish criminals and defend his people,) to appear in glory and majesty, and to recompense the blasphemies and proud boastings of their haughty persecutors. They were grieved and distressed, and thought it long while they were compelled to hear and witness such triumphs and revilings of ungodly men, and to understand how they encouraged themselves in their detestable cruelties by atheistical principles. The last verses are future in the original, and in several versions, and may be thus paraphrased: ‘Unless thou appear to execute vengeance, they will entirely crush thy people, and reduce thy heritage, the nation of Israel, to the deepest misery; for they are direct Atheists, or at least they do not believe that God at all beholds or regards the actions of men, or will call them to account for any part of their conduct.’ ‘Seeing the church was then so sore oppressed, it ought not to appear strange to us if we see it so now: and therefore we must call on God to take our cause in hand.’

7 Yet ^m they say, The LORD shall not see, neither shall the God of Jacob regard it.

8 Understand, ⁿ ye brutish among the people; and ^o ye fools, when will ye be wise?

9 He that planted the ear, ^a shall he not hear? he that formed the eye, shall he not see?

10 He that ^r chastiseth the heathen, ^s shall not he correct? ^t he that teacheth man knowledge, shall not he know?

11 The LORD knoweth the thoughts of man, that they are vanity.

12 Blessed is the man whom thou chastenest, O LORD, and ^v teachest him out of thy law;

13 That thou ^w mayest give him rest from the days of adversity, ^a until the pit be digged for the wicked.

V. 9. 'Shall He not hear your blasphemies, who gave you the faculty of hearing? Shall he not see all you do, who gave you the power of seeing? Is it possible he should give to others, what he wants himself?' (Bp. Patrick.) 'The Psalmist uses the word planted to denote the situation of the ear; and the word formed to denote the structure of the eye. The mechanism of the ear is like a root planted in the earth, and concealed from view; whereas the ball of the eye is prominent on the face, and presented to general observation.' (Hervey.)

V. 10, 11. The word rendered chastise, generally implies force, constraint, punishment, or even binding in chains; whereas that translated correct, denotes milder and gentler discipline and instruction. 'If God punish whole nations for their sins, it is mere folly for any one man, or else a few, to think that God will spare them.' Indeed he first taught Adam in Paradise, and since the fall, has in various ways taught his posterity, all the useful knowledge they possess; even those who abuse their talents in rebellion against him: and is not he himself omniscient, as well as omnipotent? But he well knows the emptiness and presumption of the thoughts, reasonings, speculations, and imaginations of apostate men, even of the very wisest and most ingenious of them: and how worthless, pernicious, and false they are!

V. 12—14. 'Not he that prospers in wickedness is happy, but he whom thou chastenest, O LORD, when he doeth amiss; and thereby teachest to study and obey thy law with greater care and diligence; which will quiet his mind under all his troubles, and at last procure the removal of them; when absolute ruin, mean time, is preparing for the ungodly.' (Bp. Patrick.) The sharpest correction by which God leads men to search, believe and obey his word, are inestimable benefits; persecutors and tyrants often are the instruments of this salutary correction to the chosen tribes of God; the persecuted and oppressed,

14 For ^b the LORD will not cast off his people, neither will he forsake ^c his inheritance:

15 But ^d judgment shall return unto righteousness: and ^e all the upright in heart ^f shall follow it.

16 Who will rise up for me against the evil-doers? or ^g who will stand up for me against the workers of iniquity?

17 Unless the LORD had been my help, my soul had ^h almost dwelt in silence.

18 When I said, ^k My foot slippeth; thy mercy, O LORD, held me up.

19 In the multitude of my thoughts within me, thy comforts delight my soul.

not the persecutors and oppressors, are the happy persons; they will have rest, when the day of vengeance overwhelms the wicked; and though God may let his people endure sharp and tedious sufferings, he "will never leave, nor ever forsake them. Therefore they may boldly say, the Lord is my Helper, I will not fear what man can do unto me."

V. 15. When iniquity triumphs, judgment seems to decline from righteousness: but when the Lord executeth vengeance on the wicked, and delivers his people, then "judgment returns to righteousness." This the upright in heart confidently expect, and therefore they adhere to the cause of piety, and continue to wait upon God in the midst of all their discouragements.

V. 16—18. It is probable that the Psalmist had expected, that many would have joined him in withstanding the oppression to which he was exposed, and which was the common cause of the nation; and that he called on them for that purpose: (Acts vii. 25.) But when he found himself disappointed, he was ready to give up all for lost; and had not God been his Helper, he must soon have been laid in the silent grave. His experience, however, did not accord to his fears; for when he was falling, his merciful God upheld him. When our Lord entered on his last scene of sufferings, he called on his disciples to watch with him one hour; but he called in vain. They first slept, and then all forsook him and fled. Yet he was carried through, and advanced to the throne of glory: and David's case was but a feeble shadow of Christ's, either in his humiliation or exaltation. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 19. The thoughts, contrivances, anxieties, and perplexities of the Psalmist's mind, seem to be here represented by the intricacies of a thicket, or labyrinth, from which there seems to be no way of escape: but communion with God, and the consolations of his Spirit so filled his heart with joy and gladness, as to raise him above them all.

V. 20. The evident injustice, oppression, and fraud of persecuting rulers, who perhaps at the same time pretend zeal for the honour of God, form an encouragement to the persecuted; who are sure that the righteous Lord will have no fellowship with such workers of iniquity under the colour of law and justice, and will give no countenance to them: however for a time he may permit them to escape with impunity.

V. 21. 'Righteousness and innocence are most atrocious crimes in the eyes of wickedness and guilt. For these crimes Cain slew his brother Abel; the Jews crucified Christ, the pagans tortured and murdered his disciples, and bad men in all ages have persecuted the good.' 'Marvel not, my brethren, if the world hate you.' (Horne.) The narrative in the New Testament, of the chief priests, scribes, elders, and people of Israel; with Pilate and his soldiers, and the Roman power, all collected against the innocent and righteous Saviour, fully answers to this description: and it is hardly possible to think, that the Holy Spirit did not intend those events, whatever occasioned the Psalmist thus to express himself.—The words righteous and innocent are singular: and the Jews themselves allow, that this psalm relates to the Messiah's kingdom.

V. 23. The nation of the Jews, (speaking by their rulers, teachers, and priests, and the congregation assembled at Jerusalem to keep the passover,) when demanding the crucifixion of Christ, vehemently exclaimed, "His blood be on us and on our children:" and the destruction of Jerusalem with unexampled slaughter, and the state of the Jews ever since, form an example of the manner in which God brings on persecutors "their own iniquity," and cuts them off in their own wickedness:" and indeed those events seem to have been expressly foretold.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

They who suppose that the exuberant goodness and mercy of God are inconsistent with the exercise of rigorous justice, and with the infliction of vengeance on the wicked; must certainly have formed very erroneous conceptions of his character: for he is indeed a God of revenges: (Marg.) vengeance belongs to him alone, except as he delegates others to be his executioners of it: and such as have seen his glory in the face of Jesus Christ, readily perceive the most perfect harmony betwixt his justice and mercy; while others are blinded by the god of this world, whatever wisdom they seem to possess, or have the reputation of. We should however remember, that vengeance does not belong to us; and therefore we must render to no man evil for evil, but leave our cause with the Judge of the earth. Under oppression and persecution we should beg of him to shine forth, and show himself, and to render a reward to the proud and ungodly: not so much, that we may be freed from suffering, as that we may not be grieved by beholding the triumphs, and hearing the slanders, blasphemies, and boastings, of the workers of iniquity. It is most horrible wickedness in any case to murder the widow, the stranger, and the fatherless: but when these are the Lord's heritage, his chosen people, who are broken in pieces and butchered for his sake, the impiety becomes still more atrocious; and the pious spectator must needs be filled with the deepest sorrow and indignation. Such wretches as commit these daring crimes cannot believe that there is a God, or that he sees and will call them to an account for their conduct: and indeed infidelity and atheism are the proper attendants on injustice and cruelty. But the Christian, whilst, in earnestly pleading for the deliverance of the church, he must request the ruin of all her enemies if they continue implacable, would still be better pleased with their conversion. He will therefore pray that this change may take place: and with boldness and meekness, as he hath opportunity, he will expostulate with them on the brutish folly of their principles and conduct. It would not be credible, if it were not undeniable, that millions of rational creatures should live, move, speak, hear, understand, remember, will, and effect their purposes; and yet discourse and behave as if they verily believed that the God from whom they derive all these capacities could neither see, nor hear, nor understand, and would never punish their rebellious abuse of them! But they will find that JEHOVAH is the fountain of knowledge, wisdom, and power, as well as of goodness and justice: and he will show them, that he was acquainted with the secret thoughts of their hearts; which are equally unreasonable and wicked, and are sure to terminate in vexation, if not in destruction. We may therefore conclude, without hesitation, that the most afflicted believer is happier than the most prosperous of the ungodly. Indeed afflictions are frequently the means of bringing sinners to repentance, and faith in the Saviour: and every man should think himself happy, who, being chastened of the Lord, is under the correction taught his truths and will, from the sacred word, and by the Holy Spirit. For he will find first rest to his soul under adversities, and at length rest from them: and the wicked will only harass him, till the pit be prepared into which they shall sink and rise no more for ever. Let not then the upright in heart fear lest the Lord should cast off his people: let them still cleave to him and follow after righteousness; and at length the just Judge will terminate the triumphs of his enemies and the sorrows of his servants. We should indeed, according to our station in the church or in society, endeavour to unite all around us in attempting to stem the torrent of impiety: but we need not wonder, if we find the remnant of believers timid and inactive, in proportion as the wicked are daring and enterprising. Yet we must bear our testimony to the truth, and use our endeavours to serve the cause of godliness, though it be alone and in sackcloth : and the Lord will help and protect us, till our testimony is finished, let who will attempt to silence us, by terror, or in a dungeon, or in the grave. But unless he also uphold us, our feet will slip : and if we have been preserved from falling into sin, or shrinking from our duty, on trying occasions, we should give him the glory, and encourage our brethren. When urgent difficulties press upon our minds, respecting our own case, or the cause of God, multitudes of thoughts, contrivances, and apprehensions will arise within us ; the indulgence of which only increases vexation, solicitude, or distrust, and renders our views more gloomy and desponding. Then should we retire, and spread the case before the Lord, and pour out our hearts unto him : thus we shall find light arise in the midst of our darkness, and divine consolations will often, not only satisfy and calm, but even delight our souls. The believer needs not be anxious about the event, either to himself or to the church : though he should see those in authority who frame mischief in enacting persecuting laws, and multitudes gathering themselves together against the soul of the righteous to condemn the innocent blood. The righteous Lord may indeed for a while bear with, but he will never patronize “ the throne of iniquity : ” and whilst he defends his cause, and is the Rock and Refuge of every saint, he will bring upon their haughtiest enemies “ their own iniquity, and cut them off in their own wickedness : yea, the LORD our God shall cut them off.” May we then join and adhere to that party which is sure at length to prevail for evermore.

NOTES.

PSALM XCV. V. 1. This psalm has no title in the Hebrew : but the Septuagint calls it, ‘ A Psalm of David ; ’ and the apostle sanctions their testimony, by his manner of quoting it, “ Wherefore as the Holy Ghost saith, &c. “ Again he limiteth a certain day, saying in David,” or by David. (Notes, Heb. iii. iv.) This passage also manifestly shows, that the apostles considered the Jewish Scriptures as the language of the Holy Spirit, whoever committed that language to writing. The Holy Ghost spake by David. The psalm appears to have been composed for the use of the Israelites, as they ascended in companies to the sanctuary, or as soon as they entered into the courts of the Lord ; being an introduction to the sacred services there performed, and especially the Psalmody, which had recently been instituted. And it is still retained in the offices of our church for similar purposes. The Psalmist ‘ sheweth that God’s service standeth not in dead ceremonies, but in the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving.’ (Notes 1.)

V. 3. Gods. ‘ Even the angels, (who in respect of men are thought as gods,) are nothing in his sight : much less the idols which man’s brain inventeth.’

V. 4. The recesses of the earth, which man cannot penetrate or investigate, are in the hand, and open to the inspection, of the Creator. The word rendered strength, and in the margin heights, is derived from a root signifying to neary : because men are wearied in ascending the heights of the mountains.

V. 5. ‘ The treasures which he had in the deep places, of the earth beneath ; the majestic pride and strength of the hills, which tower above and lift up their heads to heaven ; the unnumbered waves of the great and wide sea, which roll in perpetual motion round the world ; the rich and variegated produce of the dry land, crowned with verdure and beauty ; together with every thing that liveth in the waters and on the earth, are all under the government of our Lord.’ (Horne.)

V. 6. The former verses were intended to animate the people in joyful praise and thanksgiving : but this seems a call to humble prayer and supplication. ‘ Since God made our bodies, as well as our souls, it is meet and right that they should bear their part in his service, and that internal worship should be accompanied and signified by that which is external.’ (Horne.) Kneeling is the posture of prayer most commonly mentioned both in the Old and New Testament. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7. The Creator of the world became the God, or the covenanted Friend, of Israel, and the nation was under special obligations to devote itself to his worship and service, being taken peculiar care of by him, and favoured with manifold advantages above all other nations.

They were his people and the sheep of his pasture. (Notes, xxiii.) Yet this was only an outward relation and privilege to most of them; the whole company were a kind of type of the true Israel, and nations professing Christianity are in great measure in a similar situation. Now, in very large congregations, some may be supposed to be spiritual worshippers; and others to be destitute of saving and sanctifying faith, though attending on the means of grace. The former part of the psalm, therefore, is an address to the true worshippers, exciting them to alacrity and fervency in their spiritual sacrifices: but the latter part of it is a warning to the unbelievers, from the example of the Israelites, in the days of Moses; and the apostle hath taught us to apply it to the case of professed Christians, and to that of all who hear the Gospel. If they ever mean to hear, that is, to believe and obey, the voice of God, let them lose no time, but attend without delay; lest the sentence of exclusion should be past, and the door be for ever shut. 'He showeth wherein they are God's flock, that is, if they hear his voice.' (Notes, 1 Cor. x. 1-12. Heb. iii. iv. Jude 5.)

V. 8. The original words for provocation and temptation, are Meribah and Massah. (Notes, Ex. xvii. Num. xx. 1-13.)

V. 10, 11. The word translated grieved, is rendered in the Septuagint, provoked; and the apostle hath followed that reading, though our version retains the word grieved. Some versions render it, 'I held them in abhorrence.'—It is certainly a much more indignant word, so to speak, than that used by the apostle, when he says, "Grieve not the Holy Spirit, &c.:" for he is speaking of the wrong tempers and other failures of true Christians; but the Psalmist, or rather the Holy Spirit by him, refers to the obstinate, incorrigible unbelief and rebellion of that generation which fell in the wilderness, after all they had seen and heard of JEHOVAH's power, majesty, and goodness. "They rebelled and vexed his Holy Spirit; therefore he was turned to be their enemy, and fought against them." (Is. lxiii. 10.) The root of all this rebellion lay in their hearts; they erred, or wandered, in their hearts; they were influenced by "an evil heart of unbelief, in departing from the living God." They were apostates and idolaters: they disliked the holy service of God, and delighted in the sensualities of idolatry, and in worldly pursuits; they were carnally minded, and enmity to God; they "said to God, depart from us, for we desire not the knowledge of thy ways." And therefore the Lord passed the irrevocable sentence of exclusion from Canaan, confirmed with an oath: and set them forth in his word as a warning to all ages and nations; lest by imitating their example, they should be for ever excluded from that heavenly rest, of which Canaan was a faint shadow. (Notes, Num. xiv.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord, being infinitely powerful, wise, just, merciful, and faithful; the Creator, Benefactor, Sovereign, and Proprietor of all worlds, ought to be universally adored, loved, and praised by all his rational creatures; and gratitude to him should be the joy of every heart. But none of our fallen race cordially render him this reasonable tribute, unless they have known him, as in Christ Jesus, "the Rock of our salvation." This great God and King above all gods, in whose hand are the deep places of the earth, and the reservoirs of the mighty ocean, and whose is the strength of the hills which he hath formed, is the Friend, the Father, and Portion, of all believers. Their Creator is become their Shepherd, he sought them when lost, and brought them to his fold, and now feeds them, with tenderness and care, as the sheep of his hand. How should they then delight in celebrating the praises of their glorious and gracious Benefactor, and in thanking him for his unspeakable mercies! and how gladly should they embrace every opportunity of meeting in his courts, to join their grateful songs of praise with those of their fellow Christians! When thus we assemble together to worship our God, we should endeavour to express by our deportment, as well as to cultivate in our minds, believing confidence, joyful gratitude, and reverential awe: and, as conscious of our own meanness and unworthiness, and mindful of his infinite majesty and glory, we should "bow down, and kneel before the LORD, our Maker." But we must not imagine, that all, who meet in our religious assemblies, are capable of such spiritual worship, or partakers of such inestimable privileges. In general it is to be feared, they are but a remnant, like the few believers found in Israel, when as a nation they were excluded Canaan through unbelief. Whilst therefore the true people of God should excite each other, and ministers should excite them, to rejoice in God and to render him praise; and they ought to consider his solemn worship as the chief business of their assembling together: the rest are to be addressed in the name, and by the authority of God, to hear and obey his voice, and accept of his salvation. The abundant encouragements of the Gospel should be set before them, as well as the awful terrors of the law; that they may perceive that the Lord is still ready to forgive and to save all who come to him. But it is a concern which admits of no delay: death may come before tomorrow, if the sinner will not hear the voice of God to-day: or he may be consigned to final impenitency, and be hardened by the deceitfulness of sin. Yet men in general procrastinate, and harden their hearts against present convictions; they do violence to their own consciences, and plunge into those pleasures and pursuits which banish reflection, and increase their natural aversion to the truths and service of God. Thus is he grieved and provoked with their obstinacy; and his abused patience is wearied out by their contempt of his favour, their disregard to his displeasure, and their unbelieving neglect of his salvation. When this is the case, the Lord gives them up to their own hearts' lusts: and then they will never be able to enter heaven, any more than the condemned generation of Israel could enter Canaan. Let sinners then take warning by this awful example, and not approach the brink of that precipice, whence these ancient rebels were cast down into destruction. Let them fear giving way to temptation, by presuming upon the patience and mercy of God; let them be careful not to sin on under the means of grace, and against the conviction of their own consciences: let them be aware of the evil of their own hearts, which leads them to wander from God, and to remain ignorant, because haters, of his ways: and let them dread giving into prejudices, or infidel objections to the Gospel, because they are averse to its salutary restraints: or devising a scheme of religion more suited to their pride and lusts, and less disquieting to their consciences. These are a few of the methods by which Satan blinds and hardens numbers in our religious assemblies, to their everlasting destruction. Finally, let us all then "fear, lest a promise being left us of entering into his rest, any of us should at last be found to come short of it."

NOTES.

PSALM XCVI. V. 1. (Notes, 1 Chr. xvi. 23—34.) The Septuagint prefixes the following title to this psalm, 'When the house was built after the captivity, an Ode of David.' Hence it has been conjectured, that after the captivity, when the temple was finished, it was selected, (perhaps by Haggai, or Zechariah,) from the rest of the songs of praise, used by David at the removal of the ark; and that, some alterations having been made, it was appointed as a proper expression of the people's thankful joy on that occasion. It is, however, generally allowed to contain a prediction of the Messiah's coming and kingdom, "A new Song:" "a song calculated to celebrate new mercies, prefigured by old ones wrought for Israel in former times: as a song fit for the voices of renewed and regenerate men to sing in the new Jerusalem, in those new heavens and that new earth, which constitute the new creation, or kingdom of Jesus Christ.' (Horne.)—The prophet sheweth, that all nations shall have occasion to praise the Lord for the revealing of his Gospel.

V. 2. The clause rendered, "Show forth his salvation, &c." literally means, "Proclaim the glad tidings of his salvation from day to day." The public, unremitting, and zealous preaching of the Gospel, by the apostles and primitive evangelists to Jews and Gentiles, and by a succession of ministers ever since; with the praises and thanksgivings offered to God by them, and their numerous converts, are evidently predicted.

V. 3. The glory of God is principally displayed in the person and salvation of Christ, and in the wonders of redeeming love. This glory, as manifested in his wonderful works for Israel of old, had, by various means, been made known to the heathen, yet they adhered to their idols: (Marg. Ref.) but when the apostles declared his glory, as displayed by the Gospel, immense multitudes renounced idolatry, and at length the whole ancient system of idolatry was subverted, through a large part of the world.

V. 4. 'Seeing he will reveal himself to all nations contrary to their own expectation, they all ought to worship contrary to their imaginations, and only as he hath appointed.'

V. 5. Idols. Vanities, things of nought. The Septuagint renders it dæmons or devils. (1 Cor. viii. 4. x. 19, 20.) 'The idols, or whatever made not the heavens, are not God.'

V. 7—9. 'Ascribe unto the LORD, O ye people, from whatever family ye come,—that incomparable majesty, and supreme dominion,—which you give to your imaginary gods: and renounce them all; and acknowledging the LORD alone to be the omnipotent King of all the world, do him honour suitable to the excellency of his majesty; bring an oblation to him, in token of ‘your submission, and humbly worship him at his temple, where he hath fixed his glorious residence among us.’ (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 10. ‘He prophesieth that the Gentiles shall be partakers with the Jews of God’s promise.’ When the apostles went and preached the mediatorial kingdom of God, as set up and administered by the Son of his love, to all the nations, what did they but fulfil the command here given? And as far as their doctrine has been cordially received, the moral state of the world has been established on an immovable basis. But we are still called to pray, ‘Thy kingdom come;’ and to exhort one another, to ‘Say among the heathen, The LORD reigneth.’

V. 11, 12. These verses have great animation as a call on the universe at large, to break forth into joyful praise, and celebrate the coming, redemption, and kingdom of the Saviour: but they are more literally rendered as a direct prediction. ‘Then the heavens shall rejoice, and the earth shall be glad; the sea shall roar,’ &c. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 13. The second coming of Christ, as well as the first, seems here predicted; when ‘the creature,’ or creation, ‘shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption, into “the glorious liberty of the sons of God.”’ (Notes, Rom. viii. 19-23.) The kingdom of the Redeemer is the kingdom of righteousness and truth: He rules the world in equity, justice, and truth; he fulfils the gracious promises to his believing people; and the triumph of righteousness and truth, over wickedness and falsehood, is the certain effect. And when he shall come to judge the world, the justice and truth of God will be revealed and glorified in the destruction of the wicked according to his threatenings: and the faithfulness of God, in fulfilling his largest and kindest promises to his redeemed and devoted servants. (Notes, 2 Thes. i.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When our Emmanuel had finished his work on earth, and was received to his glory in heaven, the church began to sing a new song unto him, and to bless his name: and his apostles and evangelists lost no time, but proclaimed the glad tidings of his salvation; so that ‘daily in the temple, and from house to house they ceased not to ‘teach and to preach Jesus Christ;’ and soon they began to declare his ‘glory among the heathen, and his wonders among all people.’ His honour and majesty, his strength and excellency, were so displayed at that time, in his doctrine and by his miracles, that vast multitudes renounced their idols, to worship JEHOVAH in the beauty of holiness, as ‘God in Christ reconciling the world unto himself;’ to ‘render unto him the honour due unto his name;’ to bring their spiritual sacrifices, and to come into his courts. Still this salvation is spread abroad; it is said among the heathen, that JEHOVAH reigneth: and we are taught to hope and pray for that time, when He shall establish his kingdom in righteousness over all nations, and when the whole creation shall rejoice in him and show forth his praise. At length the incarnate God will come to judge the earth, to execute his just vengeance on his enemies, and to fulfil his promises to his people. What then are we? Would that day be welcome to our hearts? Are we prepared to join the joyful acclamations of all his servants on earth and in heaven? If this be not our case, let us now begin to prepare to meet our God, by seeking the pardon of our sins and the renewal of our souls to holiness. If we are ready, let us bless his name, bear up cheerfully under our difficulties, endeavour to promote the peace and prosperity of his kingdom; and in our proper place, and doing our proper work, let us be as faithful servants, who are habitually expecting and desiring the coming of their Lord.

NOTES.

PSALM XCVII. V. 1. The Septuagint entitles this ‘A Psalm of David, after his land was restored to him.’ I suppose, meaning that he composed it, when he was re-established in his government after Absalom’s rebellion. But whatever gave occasion to it; no doubt the Spirit of God speaking by the Psalmist, foretold the kingdom of Christ, and his victories. This verse may literally be thus rendered, ‘JEHOVAH reigneth, the earth shall rejoice; “yea, the multitude of the isles,” (or great isles), “shall be glad thereof.”’ It is a direct prediction of the conversion of the Gentiles to Christ, and their joy in him: and the evidence from prophecy appears to be very much obscured, by rendering such prophecies as exhortations.—When the righteous are exhorted to rejoice in God, (12,) the imperative, not the future tense, is used. 'He showeth that where God reigneth, there is all felicity and spiritual joy.' The Gospel shall not only be preached in Judea, but in all isles and countries.' 'We Britons, as inhabiting one of those eastern isles, and enjoying so fair a portion of evangelical blessings, have reason to repeat this verse with a particular pleasure and energy. The Hebrews called by the name of isles not only countries surrounded by the sea, but all the countries which the sea divided from them; so that the term became synonymous with Gentiles.' Thus it is said "The isles shall wait for his law," which is expounded as follows, "In him shall the Gentiles trust." (Is. xlii. 4. Matt. xii. 21.) (Horne.) Europe, however, and the isles between Asia and Europe, seem more generally meant by this expression.

V. 2. Clouds and darkness may either denote the terrors with which the Lord appals his enemies, when he goes forth to execute righteous vengeance upon them; or the obscurity which rests upon his dispensations and dealings with his people, till the accomplishment of his promises and prophecies throws light upon them. But however it may appear to his creatures, or even to his most eminent saints; however they may be ready to say, "All these things are against me:" or "Hath God forgotten to be gracious?" and however the wicked may blasphemously revile his justice as tyranny or cruelty: Yet are righteousness and judgment the basis, the support and establishment "of his throne." His mercy-seat is founded on judgment and righteousness; the justification of the believing sinner, through the merits and atonement of Christ, magnifies the law, and honours the justice as well as grace of God. Every providential dispensation, whatever present appearances may be, springs from the same glorious union of justice and mercy, in the manifold wisdom and judgment, truth and faithfulness of God. And "the day of wrath will be the revelation of the righteous judgment of God, who will render to every one according to his deeds."

V. 3—7. In the deep but righteous judgment of our King, Jerusalem and its inhabitants were miserably destroyed, as by a consuming fire, for their enmity to him and his kingdom. The subversion of the deep-rooted foundations of idolatry, throughout the vast Roman empire, during the first three centuries, and then by the conversion of Constantine the emperor to Christianity, may next be predicted, in metaphorical language taken from the displays of the divine power and presence at mount Sinai. The mountainous obstructions, which before seemed to render the general spread of Christianity insurmountable, thus melted before God, like wax before the fire: the devoted worshippers of idols, even the greatest of them, were alarmed as by tremendous lightnings and earthquakes. His righteousness, in the destruction of the persecuting tyrants of those times, was conspicuous as the heavens: all the people beheld the divine glory, in making his cause triumphant: and the pagans were confounded, and ashamed of their idols, in which they had so long gloried: not only did angels worship the exalted Redeemer; but rulers, who are the vicegerents of the great God, submitted to him, and became his subjects: and all the mighty ones of the earth bowed down before him who had prostrated the idol gods of the heathen, by his presence and power.—The Septuagint renders the word translated gods, by angels; and thus the apostle quotes the verse, when speaking of the dignity of Christ. Hence we learn that Christ himself as Emmanuel is peculiarly intended. He is the object of universal adoration: and all the angels of God, (instead of receiving worship from Christians, according to the abominable idolatry of the Roman Antichrist,) are fellow-worshippers with Christians, when adoring the great Redeemer.—Thus they were, under the law, represented by the Cherubim as bowing down over the ark, "desiring to look into these things;" and in many respects as joining in Israel's worship: and thus they are introduced by John in the Revelation, as joining in the praises of the church, to "the Lamb that was slain," &c. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8, 9. The church of God, and all her assemblies, hearing of these revolutions, would greatly rejoice to see God's judgment upon his enemies, and his exaltation above all the gods of the heathen. "There is joy in heaven among the angels of God, over one sinner that repenteth;" much more when the Redeemer triumphed over the idols of the heathen, and the kingdom of the devil.—Thus all the tidings brought to the apostles, concerning the conversion of the Gentiles, caused them to rejoice and glorify God.

V. 10. Hate evil, &c. 'Show your love to the LORD by hating and forsaking all sin.' There is a peculiar emphasis in this caution, with reference to the events supposed to have been predicted: as it is well known that secular prosperity soon corrupted the visible church in a most lamentable manner, and brought an inundation of evils which are by no means terminated at this day. Yet the souls of the faithful remnant have in every age been preserved, notwithstanding the snares of the world, inward depravity, the contagion of false doctrine, and the fury of persecution.

V. 11. 'Though God's deliverance appear not suddenly; yet it is sown and laid up in store for them.'—Light is the emblem of knowledge, holiness, and joy: yet it is here compared to seed, which lies long under the clods, but at length comes up and yields an increase. St. James exhorts Christians to wait and be patient, after the example of the husbandman: but he means real Christians, "the upright in heart," who hate evil, and are true saints; for God will surely preserve them.

V. 12. Give, &c. Some versions render this clause, "Celebrate the memorial of his holiness." (Note, xxx. 4.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The wise and righteous government of God is well calculated to rejoice the hearts of all, except rebels who have exposed themselves to his powerful vengeance: but the kingdom of JEHOVAH, as administered by the eternal Son, who hath pardons to confer on the most guilty, is a source of joy even to the sinful inhabitants of the earth. The Gospel also, when preached to those that before sat in darkness, calls for the exercise of gratitude and gladness: and this our favoured isle hath peculiar cause to be thankful: yet, alas, how few prize these privileges, or rejoice properly on account of them! Under every dispensation, the counsels and dealings of the infinite God are too mysterious for man's comprehension: but in the event we shall see, and now we should believe, that when "clouds and darkness are round about him, righteousness and judgment are the basis of his throne." It is, however, evident from history, that from time to time, his wrath, like a consuming fire, hath gone "before him to burn up his enemies round about." When he comes in his power to set up his kingdom, all opposition must melt away like wax before the fire; and dismay and ruin must be the effects of obstinate rebellion against him: while the inhabitants of heaven will "adore his righteousness, and all "the people shall see his glory." Confusion will be the portion of all those who worship and glory in graven images; and surely this idolatry is no less criminal within, than it is without, the pale of the visible church! The destruction of the imperial authority of pagan Rome, which had for ages been employed to support idolatry, was but a prelude of the destruction of that antichristian power which soon succeeded it, but hath far exceeded it in impieties and iniquities: and the Lord Jesus will ere long come, and confound all idolaters throughout the earth, and put an end to idolatry of every kind. All the angels of God worship him; we cannot therefore err in joining their adoration, and in "honouring the Son, even as we honour the Father:" and the monarchs of the earth will never consult their own interest and honour, till they prostrate themselves before him, and use their authority in obedience to his commandments. As these events take place, the church of God, in every land, doth greatly rejoice: nay, we cannot but be glad on account of those his judgments upon persecuting tyrants, which promote the spread of his Gospel. But if we really love the Lord, and desire that his "name should be hallowed, his kingdom be set up, and his will done on earth as in heaven;" we shall in proportion hate and dread the evil of sin, and carefully watch against the commission and the occasions of it. This is the best expression of our love, and our most effectual method of forwarding those desirable events.—The remnant of upright believers shall be preserved in the worst of times; and the light of joy and consolation is sown for them in a good soil, and will surely spring up and ripen to a glorious harvest. Let us then rejoice in the Lord, though in the world we have tribulation: let us thankfully recollect that his purity, justice, truth, and goodness, are pledged to support and deliver all who trust in him: and as he infinitely hates sin, yet freely loves the person of the sinner who believes in Christ; he will certainly make a final separation between the man he loves and the sin he hates, and sanctify his people wholly, in body, soul, and spirit.

NOTES.

sion of earth and hell. The words rendered “gotten himself the victory,” are literally, “hath saved for himself;” but in doing this he obtained the most glorious victories; and others at least equally glorious will at length be acquired; of which the deliverances and victories of Israel, from their departure from Egypt to the termination of the Mosaic dispensation, were but faint shadows. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2. The salvation and righteousness of God are often united in Scripture, as showing the way of a sinner’s acceptance, “by the righteousness of our God and Saviour, “Jesus Christ:” and these were made known, in the most public manner, to the heathen, by the preaching of the apostles. But perhaps the awful yet righteous vengeance executed on the Jewish nation for rejecting the Gospel, while salvation was thus sent to the Gentiles and welcomed by them, was intended. “Behold, therefore, the goodness and severity of God; on them that fell severity, but on “thee goodness!”

V. 3. ‘In sending the Messiah, God showed himself mindful of his promises, which mercy prompted him to make, and truth required him to perform.’ (Horne.)

V. 7—9. (Notes, xcvi.) The floods and hills, or more literally, ivers and mountains, are here substituted for the fields and the woods. The different orders of rational creatures in the universe seem to be poetically described under these metaphors, as rejoicing and exulting with every expression of triumph and delight in the reign of the great Messiah. Angels celebrated his birth with glad songs of triumphant praise, and fervent congratulations of man’s felicity. No doubt they triumphed with joyful praise at his ascension. They rejoice over every sinner that repents; they are his ministering spirits and the heirs of salvation; and they will execute his sovereign decisions at the day of judgment; admiring the equity and rectitude, as well as the truth and mercy, of his whole administration. (Notes, 1 Chr. xvi. 32—34. Is. lv. 12, 13.) The passage, as before, is future, and rather a prediction, than an exhortation.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The great Redeemer, “by his right hand and his holy “arm,” obtained for himself here on earth most glorious victories: by his life, death, and resurrection, he overcame the world, sin, Satan, and death; and by his triumphant ascension he threw open the gates of heaven to all believers. These are the marvellous works of JEHOVAH JESUS, which demand from us new and perpetual songs of praise. But we are more especially to inquire, whether his holy arm have gotten him the victory in our hearts, over the power of Satan, unbelief, and sin? If this be our happy case, we shall soon exchange all profane, light, and sensual strains for new songs of joy and thanksgiving; and our lives will harmonize with our lips in celebrating Emmanuel’s praise. To bring sinners to experience this needful change, he hath made known his salvation by the preaching of his gospel. “The ministration of condemnation” shows the justice of that sentence which is denounced against transgressors; and “the ministration of righteousness” declares the way in which sinners may be justified before him. Thus “his righteousness hath he showed openly,” and not by types and shadows, in the sight of the heathen: and his ministers are ordered to use great plainness of speech, in warning, instructing, and inviting men to partake of these blessings. When the Redeemer came, JEHOVAH remembered the engagements, which his mercy dictated and his truth performed to the house of Israel: and, blessed be his name, this remote corner “of the earth hath seen the salvation of our God!” Let then his people in all lands rejoice in their Saviour and King: and let them celebrate his praises, in every way and by every means, which can express how greatly they rejoice and glory in him; how they welcome him to the throne in their hearts, delight in his pleasant service, and find rest to their souls by reliance upon him. As all nature proclaims the Creator’s glory, may all nations speedily resound with the Redeemer’s name, whilst the blessings of his kingdom fill the earth with gladness. Yet sin in its dreadful effects will not be utterly abolished, until the Lord shall come to judge the world in righteousness. Then this visible creation will be dissolved; and his people will enter those “new heavens, and that new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness.” “Seeing then we look for such things, let us give diligence, that we may be found of him in peace, without spot, and blameless.”

NOTES.

PSALM XCIX. V. 1—3. The Septuagint assigns this psalm also to David; whether on sufficient grounds or not is uncertain. The word rendered tremble, signifies also to rage or fret; and being future, the opposition of the Jews and Gentiles to the establishment of Messiah's kingdom, and their furious persecutions of the church in the primitive times, seem to be predicted; as well as the consternation of the opposers, while they witnessed the success of the Gospel, and saw their resources, one after another, failing them, and every thing foreboding their disgrace and ruin. For it was evident that the Lord was great in Zion: and was determined to effect a revolution in the moral and religious state of the world; and to show himself "high above all people," (Marg. Ref.) So that nothing remained but unreserved and cordial submission; and a willing exchange of idolatry and superstition for the spiritual worship of the awful and holy name of Israel's God.

V. 4. 'None can resist him: yet he is not a King that uses his power to wrong and oppress his subjects; but to do them right; and to give them relief, in which he delights. He hath hitherto governed the seed of Israel with exact justice and singular mercy.' (Bp. Patrick.) 'Impenitent rebels must feel the weight of his arm, and none can accuse the justice of their punishment: but in all other cases, he is mighty only to save.' (Horne.)

V. 5. (9.) This is a call to the trembling or raging persecutors to submit to God, and bow to the Messiah's sceptre, (Notes, ii.) The temple, or the ark, was the footstool before which they were to prostrate themselves in humble adoration. These were typical of the person and mediation of Emmanuel.

V. 6. God was often so provoked at Israel, as to threaten to destroy the nation: but Moses and Aaron, at one time, and Samuel at another; and in like manner the priests, and prophets, and zealous believers, in different ages, interceded; and so the nation was spared; but these were only types of that great Mediator, "who is able to save to the uttermost all them that come to God through him; seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them."—The wrath of God, therefore, against the opposers of the Gospel, need not drive any to despair; for he that heard Moses, Aaron, and Samuel, through the typical sacrifices, and spared Israel, would spare all that submitted and sought mercy through the sacrifice and intercession of Christ. The same consideration was also well calculated to encourage the prayers and supplications of the persecuted and afflicted church.

V. 7. In, &c. or from "the cloudy pillar." Thus, the Lord, in a most condescending manner, made known his will to Moses and Aaron, and by them to Israel. To Samuel also he revealed himself with great clearness, though in another way: and they answered his kindness, by an habitual course of zealous obedience; so that they were both blessed, and blessings to Israel.

V. 8. Tookest, &c. In answer to the prayers of Moses, Aaron, and Samuel, the Lord repeatedly spared the nation of Israel: yet he took vengeance on the ring-leaders of rebellion among them: and he caused the people to suffer for, and even by means of, "their own inventions;" (Exod. xxxii. xxxiii. Num. xiv.) When Aaron burned incense between the living and the dead, the plague was stayed; yet many of the people had previously died of it; (Num. xvi.) And when Samuel prayed for the people, they were spared; but their King, whom they had sinfully desired, proved a severe scourge unto them. (1 Sam. xii.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Jehovah reigning on a mercy-seat, may be viewed with joy by all his faithful subjects: but his great salvation will aggravate the guilt of obstinate rebels; and as hitherto the greatest number, even of those that have heard the Gospel, have continued impenitent and unbelieving, the inhabitants of the earth have abundant cause to tremble at the report of the Redeemer's absolute authority and almighty power. But he still waiteth to be gracious: let then all who hear take warning and seek his mercy.—Our God is "great in Zion, and high above all people:" and the chief of sinners may yet rejoice, and praise his great and terrible name, though he is holy, yea, because he is holy. His power is exercised in perfect wisdom and justice; and though he executes just punishment on his enemies: yet he most delighteth in showing mercy to the humbled transgressor. As he loveth judgment and righteousness in his own administration; so he establisheth equity amongst his subjects, and requireth them to be holy, because he is holy. His worshippers must bow before him in humility and reverence, and seek conformity to him; whilst they exalt him by their adorations, and give him the glory of their salvation. There have always however been many professed worshippers of God; who have neither believed his truths, nor obeyed his will: and there is so much faulty in all of us, that our persons and services might justly be rejected by him. But our Prophet and High-Priest, of far greater dignity than Moses, Aaron, or Samuel, who received and declared to us the will of the Father, and who himself perfectly observed his testimonies and ordinances, and who "bare our sins in his own body on the tree," continually pleads for us before the throne, and prevails for our pardon and acceptance. Encouraged by these glad tidings, we may come before him and call upon his name, and expect an answer of peace; nay, our supplications for others, may be an extensive blessing to them; "for the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much." But would we thus be heard, we must uprightly walk in all the ordinances and commandments of the Lord. And as no prayers will prevent the ruin of impenitent sinners: so believers will surely be corrected by their own inventions, when they commit iniquity, though the Saviour's intercession prevent their final condemnation. Let us then entertain high and honourable thoughts of the LORD our God; and not only exalt him with our lips, but give him the throne in our hearts: and whilst we worship him upon his mercy-seat; let us never forget that he is holy, and abhors hypocrisy, as much as profaneness and infidelity.

3 ^f Know ye that the LORD he is God: [†] it is he that hath made us, and [†] not we ourselves; ^h we are his people, and the sheep of his pasture.

NOTES.

PSALM C. Title. 'There is no other Psalm hath a like title with this, which is called "A Psalm of praise;" or rather of thanksgiving, or acknowledgment of divine blessings. The Hebrews imagine that it was peculiarly appointed to be sung when the sacrifices of thanksgiving were offered.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 1. The Psalmist 'invites all the world to join with the Israelites, in the service of Him who was kind and gracious to them beyond expression. Accordingly we Christians very properly use it, in acknowledgment of God's wonderful love to us in Christ: by whom we offer up continually spiritual sacrifices, for redeeming us by the sacrifice he made of himself; for making the world anew, and creating us again unto good works, according to his faithful promises, which we may depend on for ever.' (Bp. Patrick.)

Joyful noise. The sound of the trumpets, at the beginning of the Jubilee, seems alluded to. (Notes, Lev. xxv.)

V. 2. These continually reiterated calls to joy and gladness in serving God, should not pass unnoticed: for they show that exalted piety is the most abundant source of true rejoicing; and that sorrow and dejection do not spring from piety, even in religious persons; but arise from the want of more religion, and from occasional circumstances.

V. 3. Some versions render this verse as follows: "Acknowledge that JEHOVAH is God: It is he, (and not we ourselves,) that made us his people and the sheep of his pasture:" and this is indeed the more literal translation. 'His we are; and by his power and goodness, not our own, we are become so great and mighty a nation; of whom of his own good will alone he hath made his peculiar people, of whom he takes a tender care.'—'To deny that we created ourselves is altogether needless: but that it is not to be ascribed to our industry or wit, that we are raised to a happy condition, is a proper expression of humility,' (Bp. Patrick.)—'He chiefly means touching the spiritual regeneration, whereby we are his sheep and people.' (Deut. vii. 6—8. viii. 17. 1 Chr. xxix. 14—16. 2 Cor. iv. 6. Jam. i. 18.)—The marginal reading "His we are," requires an alteration in the original text.

NOTES.

PSALM CI. Title. 'The title tells us who made this psalm : and the matter of it is so plain, that any body may see that it is a pious resolution of David to govern first himself, and then his court, and then his kingdom, with so much care, that the good might expect all favour from him ; but no wicked men of any sort, have the least countenance.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 1. The mercy of God shown towards David, and his righteous judgments upon his persecutors, were not only the subjects of his grateful praise, but the pattern he proposed to imitate in his administration. 'David considered what manner of king he would be, when God should place him on the throne, promising openly that he would be merciful and just.'

V. 2. 'Though as yet thou deferrest to place me in the kingly dignity ; yet I will give myself to wisdom and uprightness, being a private man.' Some, however, think that the psalm was composed while David ruled over Judah, but not over Israel. David purposed to unite wisdom and piety, with justice and mercy, in his behaviour before his family and court, as well as in his public administration. He meant to walk uprightly in the ordinances and commandments of God, as an example to his people. But knowing that his ability to perform his vow would depend upon the Lord's presence with him, he prayed with earnest desires, and as impatient of delay, that the Lord would speedily come and dwell with him, and bless him.

V. 3. 'I will not propose to myself, or think of carrying into execution, any iniquitous scheme of politics, however advantageous or tempting it may appear. I will reject it at once, "I hate the work of those who turn aside," who deviate from the divine law to serve their own interests.'—'No such corrupt principle shall adhere to my soul, or find a place in my affections. How noble a resolution for a king to make ! but how difficult an one for a king to keep !' (Horne.) 'He sheweth that magistrates do not their duty, except they be enemies to all vice.'

V. 4. 'I will turn him instantly out of my service, who shall dare to suggest to me any crooked counsels. I will have no familiarity with him, much less make him my favourite, who makes no conscience how he compasses his ends.' (Bp. Patrick.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The service of God would be the delight of all rational creatures, did they all know and love his glorious excellencies, and were they sensible of their obligations to him. As far as we on earth take pleasure in worshipping him, and can serve him with gladness of heart and songs of fervent praise, we emulate the employment and anticipate the joys of heaven. Let us then study to know the glorious and eternal JEHOVAH, as our Creator, and the God in whom we live, and move, and are ; by whose arm we are upheld, and on whose bounty we are fed : and then we shall understand how reasonable it is that we should be thankful and obedient to him. But if we can also say,

'And when like wandering sheep we stray'd,
'He brought us to his fold again ;'

We shall have abundant cause "to enter into his courts with praise, to be thankful to him, and to bless his name." His goodness to us hath been great beyond expression : and the effects of his mercy will be everlasting to our souls, and his faithfulness is the perpetual security for the performance of his largest promises. And as JEHOVAH's truth and mercy endure for ever : sinners of every land should be invited to come and rejoice in his salvation. In the fulness of time the Gentiles were admitted into the Christian church, in performance of Old Testament prophecies, but contrary to the narrow expectations of the Jews ; and assuredly the inhabitants of all lands will ere long come, and make a joyful noise before God our Saviour. So that this song of praise should be considered as a prophecy, and even used as a prayer, for the coming of that time, when all people shall know that the LORD he is God, and shall become his worshippers and "the sheep of his pasture."

PSALM CII.

The Psalmist pours out doleful complaints, 1—11. He takes comfort from the eternity of God, 12. He predicts the triumph of the church, though then desolated, according to the promises of God, at the appointed time, and in answer to the prayers of his people, 13—17. He records the mercies of the Lord for the benefit of posterity, 18—22. Conscious of his own weakness, he rests his hope on the unchangeableness of God, 23—28.

V. 5. 'In promising to punish these vices, which are most pernicious in them that are about kings, he declar-
 'eth that he will punish all.'

V. 6. One great improvement of power, either in church or state, consists in carefully and wisely selecting fit persons for all the different services required, in order to the prosperity and good order of both : though, alas ! this is very rarely indeed attended to, and men with David's spirit are every where much wanted.

V. 8. Early, or, in the mornings, that is, every morning. (Jer. xxi. 12.) Promptitude, activity, and perseverance are alike necessary to suppress vice in the state, and to keep the visible church, and even its most sacred offices, pure from the pollution of ambitious and covetous hypocrites. The latter is called, "the city of the LORD : " but it has too often been made a city of merchandise, and even "a den of thieves."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When we celebrate the praises of the divine perfections, we should, in many cases, consider them as patterns for our imitation : but we never can so clearly understand in what respect this example is imitable by us, as when we view it exhibited in the person of the incarnate Son of God. His compassionate and condescending love to sinners harmonizes with the most perfect abhorrence of sin : and his conduct as our exalted King is conformable to his holy life on earth. He does not connive at any wickedness or bear it in his presence ; he abhors the works of those who turn aside from his righteous ways ; and can no more allow his disciples to cleave to sin, than he can cleave to it himself. They who continue of a perverse disposition must depart from him ; and at the day of judgment he will reject all the workers of iniquity, as those whom he never knew. He will as certainly punish the subtle undermining slanderer, as the murderer : pride and covetousness will no more escape, than adultery or drunkenness ; and hypocrites, and liars of every kind, will be doomed to the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone. In short, he will destroy all impenitent sinners ; and those with peculiar detestation, who form a part of his visible church, and are a scandal to it. Such are often removed from the earth, to prevent further mischief ; but at length a final and eternal separation shall be made, and no wicked person shall ever enter the city of the Lord in the world to come. But he will search out, watch over, and favour the faithful, who repent and renounce their sins, trusting in his mercy, and by his grace learn to walk before him in truth and righteousness : these are his servants on earth, and they shall dwell with him for ever in heaven. This is his determination and invariable conduct ; nor will he treat any as his people, who are not redeemed from all iniquity, and progressively purified unto him, a peculiar people zealous of good works. This example should be copied by rulers and magistrates especially : justice, truth, goodness and piety, should be visible in their whole conduct : and then their patronage and influence should unite with the impartial and vigorous exercise of their authority, in discountenancing all vice and impiety, in protecting the righteous, and in promoting the cause of God. By a resolute and steady adherence to such a plan, wicked doers might be reclaimed or restrained ; and we might appear like a part of the city of God, by the prevalence of equity and piety. Ministers, heads of families, and all others, in the superior relations or stations of life, have also an important duty in this matter. Their example and influence, and the exercise of their authority ; their refusal to be acquainted with notorious sinners, or to show favour to them, or even to employ them ; their decided disapprobation of slanderers, flatterers, and all dissemblers : and the encouragement of the faithful, humble, and upright, would have an extensive good effect ; if they would adopt David's resolutions, or rather imitate Christ's example. It is true this would require much wisdom and courage ; and of ourselves we are not sufficient for such services : but the Lord would come to us, and even abide with us, if we earnestly and cordially entreated him ; and then his grace would be sufficient for us, his favour would render any station comfortable, and his blessing would crown our endeavours with success. But let us recollect, that if we refuse to obey his command and copy his example, whilst we call him our Lord and Master, he will treat us as hypocrites and liars, exclude us from his family, and drive us with indignation from his presence, as workers of iniquity whom he never acknowledged or approved.

NOTES.

PSALM CII. Title. This psalm seems to have been written towards the conclusion of the Babylonish captivity (or, as some think just after the return of the remnant under Zerubbabel,) for the use of the pious Jews who were overwhelmed with affliction, on account of the desolations of their holy city and temple: yet they poured out their complaint with some hope of redress, as God had promised to restore them again to their own land. But the termination of the reign of Antichrist seems also to be predicted.

V. 1, 2. 'Albeit we be in ever so great misery; yet
'there is ever room left for prayer.'

V. 3—11. 'These excessive kinds of speech show how much the affliction of the church ought to wound the hearts of the ungodly.' Perhaps the Psalmist was grievously afflicted in his own person, as well as on account of the public calamities; but he seems to personate Jerusalem and the church, during the desolations of the captivity. He complains that his health vanished like the smoke which is scattered by the wind, his strength decayed as wood is consumed by the fire, and his spirits dried up as the grass is withered by the scorching sun. He had lost his appetite, was reduced to a skeleton, courted solitude, was deprived of sleep, and spent his time in mourning and complaints. The unjust reproaches and formidable combinations of his enraged enemies united with the just indignation of God to fill him with disquietude. It seemed as if the Lord had only raised him to prosperity, in order to cast him down; and he was constrained to feed upon sorrow, as his bread, and as it were to mingle his drink with tears. In short, he was like a man about to expire of some wasting sickness. All this well applies to the state of the church during the Babylonish captivity; and corresponds to the language of Jeremiah in the book of Lamentations.

V. 12. It is very beautiful and instructive to view the Psalmist consoling himself under all his afflictions and the prospect of speedy dissolution, while his people and the church were in deep distress, by the thoughts that God would still be glorious, would still favour the church, and restore her from her desolations. His sufferings and death therefore might be regarded as comparatively of little consequence. Thy remembrance may mean either the church's remembrance of JEHOVAH's wonderful works for Israel, and engagements to her; or rather his remembrance of his holy covenant, and of her desolate and afflicted state, from which he had promised to deliver her.

24 * I said, O my God, take me not away in the midst of my days: * thy 25 ° Of old hast thou laid the foundation of the earth; and the heavens are the work of thy hands.

V. 13-22. God had by his prophet Jeremiah fixed a time for liberating the captive Jews, and for rebuilding the city and the temple: that time was come; and this excited the prayers of believers, who favoured the very dust and stones of Zion, for the sake of the temple which had stood upon it. In their destitute and forlorn condition, they not only "groaned, being burdened" with the oppression and persecution of those who detained them prisoners; but they were instant in prayers, which doubtless they accompanied with humiliation for their sins. These prayers the Lord would not despise; but in answer to them, as one who looked down from his holy heaven, he would surely appear for their release; and when he had conducted them to Jerusalem, they would there declare his name and his praise. Under his protection and by his assistance, the temple would be rebuilt upon mount Zion: then he would appear so glorious in his power, truth, and love, that the heathen would fear his wrath, and all kings round about would stand in awe for his glory; many people would gather together out of the adjacent kingdoms to serve the Lord; and these events would be recorded for the edification of future ages, and of other nations, which should at length be brought into the church by the new-creating power of God. But this prophecy will have a more full accomplishment when the Jews shall be converted to Christianity, and gathered from their dispersions; when the tedious captivity of the church under the New Testament Babylon shall finally be terminated; and when the fulness of the Gentiles, with all their kings and kingdoms, shall be brought into the church. The old version of the fifteenth and two following verses, is quite literal, and very expressive. "Then the heathen shall fear the LORD, and all the kings of the earth thy glory: when the LORD shall build up Zion, and shall appear in his glory; And shall turn unto the prayer of the desolate, and not despise their prayer."

V. 23, 24. Perhaps the Psalmist, personally, from his time of life and state of health, had expected to see the re-establishment of Jerusalem, the prosperity of his people, and multitudes thronging to the temple to sacrifice, and worship God. But he was unexpectedly seized with a debilitating disease, and concluded that he was about to be taken away in the midst of his days; as Job, Hezekiah, and others had done; and he prayed, as Moses also did, that he might live to witness the prosperity of his people, which he by faith clearly foresaw. Some, however, apply this to the church of Israel. She was, as it were, on her way to meet her expected King; but at the captivity her strength was weakened, and her days seemed to be shortened: but she prayed to be spared, that she might receive the promised blessing.

V. 25-28. (Notes, Heb. i. 10-12.) The eternity and immutability of God the Creator of the world and the Saviour of the church, encouraged the pious Jews under their distresses. The visible creation indeed waxes old, and is wearing out, and will at length be changed as an old garment for a new one. But the Creator is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. (Heb. xiii. 8.) And because he lives and reigns, his church must be preserved; a succession of believers, as the children of Abraham, shall serve him whilst the world endures; and all the redeemed shall live with him in heaven for ever. We cannot but know from the Scriptures above referred to, what views the inspired writers of the Old Testament had of the expected Messiah, whom they spake of as the eternal and unchangeable Creator, as well as the Redeemer and King of Israel. The apostle, writing to the Hebrews, no doubt quoted this psalm in the sense in which it was generally understood. 'It cannot be too hard for thee to raise Zion out of her ruins, who hast many ages ago created this goodly fabric by thy eternal Word' (Bp. Patrick.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The more overwhelming our afflictions are, the greater cause have we to pour out our complaint before God: and he hath invited and commanded us to "call upon him in the time of trouble," and hath assured us, that he will not hide his face from us or leave us comfortless. In this world we must expect tribulation, and we know not how deep and durable our sorrows may be: but should they be so various and grievous, as to warrant the use of the strong language before us, they would not be equal to our deservings, and it would still be "of the LORD's mercies that we were not consumed:" still there would be hope for us in the God of our salvation; and it would behoove us to humble ourselves before him, and patiently to wait and pray for his forgiving love. Then should we lose our relish for every earthly comfort, and be kept by pain and anguish from taking any rest; should we be treated with general contempt and hatred, and struggle with sore temptations and anguish of spirit, and have death continually before our eyes: we should still have inward supports, and hope would brighten our otherwise gloomy prospect. The believer, who has attained to a good measure of ripeness in judgment and experience, will feel himself deeply in-

PSALM CIII.

David earnestly praises God for his plentiful mercy and goodness to him and to Israel; his fatherly compassion to the frailty of those that fear and obey him; and his constant regard to their posterity, 1—18. He calls on men and angels and all creatures to join him in blessing the Lord the universal Sovereign, 19—22.

terested in the concerns of the church. Her desolations, divisions, and corruptions, pain his heart in his most prosperous days, and double the poignancy of his personal afflictions. The triumphs of infidels and profligates, and the sorrows of true believers, cause him to partake of the bread and water of affliction, and to humble himself before God in lamentations and prayers. On the other hand, he rejoices in the promises of God, relating to the security and prosperity of his church: and the revival of the power and purity of religion revives his heart, even under grievous pains, and at the approach of death. This might afford us never-failing comfort, if we duly attended to the word of God. The success of the Gospel has indeed hitherto been small, compared with the millions of the human species. The low estate of vital godliness within the visible church hath often made her appear like one dying of a consumption: but "the Lord will certainly arise, and have mercy on Zion." Though, like Jerusalem of old, the Christian church seem laid in ruins, by the assaults of open enemies, and the treachery of pretended friends, and through the prevalence of idolatry, superstition, infidelity, and impiety: yet the servants of God take pleasure even in her ruins, and their prayers incessantly ascend to heaven in her behalf. They are indeed often poor and destitute in the world, and despised by proud ungodly men; and sometimes they are laid to groan in prisons, as men appointed to death: but the Lord regards, and will honour them; he will look down from heaven to hear and deliver them; he will build up Zion, that his glory may appear: and indeed the set time to favour her is near at hand, and many revolutions within the former kingdom of Antichrist seem evident presages of its approaching ruin. Shortly the Lord will deliver and purify his church, and Jews and Gentiles shall unite in worshipping God our Saviour, and in declaring his name and glory in our Zion: and all the kingdoms of the earth shall become his worshippers and servants. And were not these things written for the use of the generations to come, that nations then unborn might praise the Lord, when they should behold the performance of these ancient prophecies? It is true the Christian church was so soon debilitated and corrupted, her days of prosperity were so shortened, and her enfeebled estate hath been so prolonged, that many despair of happier days. Yet such are evidently predicted: and He who laid the foundation of the earth, is the unchangeable and eternal Support of his church: and as he hath foretold the dissolution of the frame of nature, he hath also assured us that his cause shall triumph on earth before that grand consummation. Let us then rejoice in God our Saviour, and give ourselves unto prayer; assured that the children of his servants shall continue to the end of time, and their seed shall be established for ever in heaven.

NOTES.

PSALM CIII. Title. David is supposed to have written this most beautiful psalm, when he was newly recovered from a dangerous sickness to vigorous health.

V. 1. 'He wakeneth his dulness to praise God, showing that both understanding and affections, mind and heart, are too little to set forth his praise.'

V. 2. David's fear of losing the sense and remembrance of the benefits which God had bestowed on him, shows both what the fallen nature of man is most prone to, and what divine grace most teaches the regenerate to watch and pray against; namely, ingratitude to God.

V. 3, 4. The sickness with which the Psalmist was visited had been the correction of his sin: but having obtained forgiveness, the malady was also removed. Thus his life was redeemed from the grave, and his soul from the pit of destruction; and all his comforts were restored and increased. Sinful passions are the diseases of the soul: but if sin be pardoned, these also will be healed.

V. 5. Eagle's. It is generally agreed, that the eagle is very long-lived, and seems at an advanced age to possess the vigour of youth. Perhaps the Psalmist had nothing more in view than this: He had been reduced to great weakness, with loss of appetite, and other infirmities, which he supposed to indicate his approaching death, or the labour and sorrow of old age. But he unexpectedly recovered health, appetite, and strength; and seemed, like the eagle, to be restored to the vigour of youth, at an advanced time of life. Many traditions about the eagle seem not sufficiently proved: nor is it certain, that in moulting her feathers, she materially differs from other birds. 'I can never sufficiently praise thee, who dost restore my strength, and make my youth and freshness return like the eagle's. O that I may with fresh delight and joy be still praising thee, and be lifted up to heaven, (as they are when they have renewed their plumes,) in more vigorous love, and affectionate desires and endeavours, to employ all my renewed strength in thy faithful service.' (Bp. Patrick.)

exclusively belong, should be carefully noted. (Note, Gen. xxii. 10-12.)

V. 14. The word rendered our frame, generally means, the device or imagination which we frame in our hearts, (Gen. vi. 5. viii. 21:) and the clause seems to mean, that God knoweth our fallen nature, both in respect of its depravity and frailty; and should he deal with us in strict justice, we must all be crushed and destroyed. He therefore exercises fatherly compassion to those that fear him; notwithstanding the evil which he witnesses in their hearts and lives: and he is long-suffering to the wicked, giving them space for repentance, and often warning them, before he inflicts deserved punishment.

Dust, (Note, Gen. xviii. 27, 28.) The sentence, "Dust thou art and to dust shalt thou return," was pronounced against man as fallen. "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, because all have sinned."

V. 15-18. (Note, 1 Pet. i. 23-25.) This affecting illustration of human frailty, and the transient nature of all earthly glory and prosperity, frequently recurs in Scripture: but it is here contrasted, most beautifully, with the everlasting mercy and truth of God. 'Let not man presume, who withereth like the green herb: but then let not man despair, whose nature, with all its infirmities, the Son of God hath taken upon him. The flower which faded in Adam, blooms anew in Christ, never to fade again.' (Horne.) The language used by the Psalmist is very emphatical. "The mercy of JEHOVAH, is from eternity and to eternity." (Notes, Eph. i. 4-7. iii. 11. 2 Tim. i. 9:) And this mercy, which is from everlasting in its source, and to everlasting in its efficacy, is ensured to all them that fear God, in every generation; who must therefore be the same with true Christians: "And this righteousness" "to children's children."—'His just and faithful keeping of his promise;' that is,

V. 6-8. Lively gratitude for recent personal benefits led the Psalmist to remember, with adoring praise, the glorious perfections of his gracious Benefactor, as manifested in his dealings with his creatures. The omnipotent Sovereign of the world uses his power in executing righteousness, relieving the oppressed, and crushing the oppressor. This he especially did, when he delivered Israel from Egyptian bondage; and by Moses made himself known to the people, and brought them acquainted with his works, his truth and laws: and especially he showed his glory to Moses, and proclaimed his name, as "merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and plenteous in mercy." (Note, Ex. xxxiv. 5-7.)

V. 9. 'He showeth first his severe judgment; but so soon as the sinner is humbled, he receiveth him to mercy.' Such expressions must always be understood of true believers, or of those who by affliction are brought to repentance and works meet for repentance: for God will keep his anger for ever, in the full meaning of the words, against all that continue to the end of life impenitent and unbelieving.

V. 10. 'Blessed be his name, there is mercy even in our punishments: our sufferings are never so great as our sins.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 11-13. The immeasurable height of the arch of heaven is an emblem continually before us of the infinite mercy of God to his people. The space betwixt the rising and setting sun reminds us of the immense distance to which their guilt is removed from them; and the compassion of a tender father feebly represents the kindness and tenderness of God to them. A wise and good father will not be severe to mark every failure in his child; he will encourage his feeble attempts to obey him; he will feel every stroke which he inflicts, when chastising him for his good; and he will always gladly remove his sufferings when he is able. The character to which these blessing the promise made to Abraham, and in him to all believers, of special benefits to their posterity. But then the persons spoken of, to prevent mistakes, are further characterized; "To such as keep his covenant, and to those that remember his commandments to do them." They come to him, according to the covenant of mercy ratified "with Abraham in Christ, which the law given four hundred and thirty years afterwards could not disannul;" they adhere to it as their only ground of hope: and daily endeavour to "walk in all his commandments and ordinances blameless." They cannot indeed perform his commandments, (20:) but they remember them, with a real desire and purpose of unreserved obedience. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 19. The mediatorial kingdom of God, as administered by Emmanuel; ("who is Head over all," for the benefit of his church,) seems especially intended.

V. 20—22. "In that we, who naturally are slow to praise God, exhort the angels who willingly do it, we stir up ourselves to consider our duty, and awake out of our sluggishness." The language used, concerning the obedience of "the angels, who excel in strength," should be compared with that which describes the obedience of frail sinful man. (18.) The business, privilege, and felicity of angels consist in perfectly doing their Maker's will. (Marg. Ref.) "Let all with one consent bless his holy name: and thou, my soul, be sure thou never forget to make one. O fail not to bear thy part in this joyful choir, that daily sing his praise." (Bp. Patrick.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Our God is a Spirit, and must be worshipped in spirit and truth. We must therefore "call upon our souls, and all that is within us, to bless his holy name:" we must also entreat him to assist us, that we may lift up our souls unto him; otherwise the most excellent words and the most melodious singing will be entirely unacceptable. But, alas! how prone are we all to forget his benefits! Without constant recollection we shall continually omit to render thanks to God, for the unceasing favours of his providence and grace: and indeed we never keep pace with our great Benefactor in these returns, or in making a proper use of his goodness. His readiness to forgive makes way for all his other benefits to the sinful race of men: and without an interest in his pardoning mercy, no natural endowments or providential gifts will prove real blessings. But the true believer may praise the Lord, for having forgiven, and for daily forgiving, all his iniquities, having set forth his own Son to be the sacrifice for them. He is also daily healing the diseases of his soul, which are far more malignant than those of the body: and as he preserveth our temporal lives; so he redeemeth the souls of his people from merited destruction, "and crowneth them with loving kindness and tender mercies." The plentiful provision made for our outward wants, and even for our enjoyment, demands a tribute of grateful praise: but the feast with which our God satisfieth the souls of his people, is a still more important obligation. The renewal of health after wasting sickness is very pleasant, and should be acknowledged with hearty thanksgiving: yet the renewal of our souls to holiness, and the renewal of our spiritual strength from day to day, are blessings of a nobler and more enduring nature. But we cannot recount half our mercies, nor by any means form a due estimate of them, till they be completed in eternal glory. We should therefore, to enliven our gratitude, trace these streams back to the fountain, and consider the Lord's constant goodness to his people, as well as his peculiar kindness to us. He is the righteous Judge of the world, and the Patron of all that are oppressed: he rescued Israel from Egyptian bondage, and executed judgment on their haughty oppressors: but he redeems his people from a far more deplorable slavery. "He made known his ways unto Moses, and his acts to the children of Israel:" but he has displayed more clearly his glorious perfections by his son Jesus Christ; and hath afforded us advantages far superior to any they enjoyed. We are shown in the most effectual manner, that "the Lord is merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and plenteous in mercy:" and happy are we, if we have come at his invitation to share the blessings of his Gospel. In this case, we may indeed experience rebukes and corrections; but He will not always chide, neither will "He keep his anger for ever:" and every humbled penitent knows, that "He hath not dealt with him after his sins, nor rewarded him according to his iniquities." If indeed this be our character, we need not yield to discouragement at the consideration of our most atrocious and multiplied transgressions; seeing the mercies of God are still larger than they all: and when we trust in those mercies, he will put away our sins far from us, and bury them in the depths of the sea. Indeed we are yet weak and frail; our days are few, our temporal comforts are withering as the grass, and we shall soon be gone: but our heavenly Father knoweth our frame, and remembereth that we are dust; and he pitieth us under all our sorrows and trials. He will indeed thwart our wayward inclinations, and will not indulge us to our hurt; but he will support and comfort us under every cross, and he cannot want power to relieve his afflicted children. His mercy is from everlasting in its origin, and to everlasting in its blessed effects, and should be contrasted with all the fading glories of this world: and they who belong to the Lord, have the fairest prospect of felicity for their children; and may entertain a cheerful hope, that he will make known his righteousness and salvation even to their remote posterity. But they are distinguished by their characters, as well as by their privileges: for they join themselves to the Lord according to his gracious covenant, and whilst they trust in his mercy they “remember his commandments “to do them.” Our glorious God and King hath prepared a mercy-seat for his throne in heaven, on which he ruleth over all. Let us then rejoice, that innumerable hosts of angels, who excel in strength, are continually celebrating his praises. Their employment and happiness consist in doing his commandments, in hearkening to the voice of his word, in being his servants, and doing his pleasure. Such would have been our constant delight, if we had not been fallen creatures: such it is in a measure become, if we are born of God; and such it will be for ever in heaven to all who arrive there; nor can we be perfectly happy, till we can take unwearied pleasure in perfect obedience to the will of our God. Let us then copy the example of these bright spirits; and cordially join our feeble hallelujahs to their exalted praises of God our Saviour: let us glorify him with all his works in all places of his dominion; and rejoice in hope, that the earth, as well as the heavens, will at length be filled with those who praise the Lord, and “do his commandments, hearkening unto the “voice of his word.”

NOTES.

PSALM CIV. V. 1. The Septuagint ascribes this psalm to David; and as it opens with the same words, which both begin and close the preceding psalm, some expositors conjecture that it was written at the same time. ‘The Psalmist celebrates the mighty power and goodness of God, in the fabric of the world; as the hundred and third doth benefits to himself and the children of ‘men.’ (Bp. Patrick.) ‘The prophet sheweth that we need not to enter into the heavens to seek God, for all the order of nature, with the propriety and placing of the elements, are most lively mirrors to see his majesty ‘in.’ He manifests himself in each of his works; and though he himself is invisible; yet his garments of glory and beauty are every where most clearly seen. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2. The formation of light was the beginning of the work of this visible creation, by which God discovered his glory in the beauty and excellency of his other works. Knowledge, wisdom, purity, and felicity, are denoted by the emblem of light; and with these the Lord is most gloriously arrayed. (Marg. Ref.) ‘Thou art kept from all mortal eyes by that inaccessible light, wherein thou dwellest above.’ The writers of the New Testament expressly ascribe the work of creation to the divine Saviour: and when, at his transfiguration, “his face did shine “as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light;” he gave his disciples a glimpse of “that glory which he “had with the Father, before the world was.” (Marg. Ref.) ‘The spacious heavens are the royal pavilion, which thy sovereign power has extended, like a canopy, for thy Majesty, in this great palace of the world.’ (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 3. JEHOVAH is here represented as building the upper stories of his magnificent palace in those waters above the firmament, whence the clouds are formed; upon which he comes riding as in a chariot, when by his thunder and lightning he appals or destroys the inhabitants of the earth: and he “walketh upon the wings of the “wind,” when storms and tempests execute his commands.

V. 4. The old translation of this verse is strictly literal, “Which maketh the spirits his messengers, and a flaming “fire his ministers.” The word rendered spirits may, however, be translated winds. ‘As the prophet there sheweth that all visible powers are ready to serve God; so the apostle beholds in this glass, how the very angels also are obedient to his commandments.’ ‘He sends his angels, (and what king is there that hath such noble ministers?) sometimes in vehement winds, and sometimes in lightning and thunder, whereby they execute his royal pleasure.’ (Bp. Patrick.) ‘Who maketh those glorious spirits of heaven his messengers; and causeth them to appear in the forms of fire; and maketh both the winds and the fire to execute those offices of revenge or preservation, which he committeth to them.’ (Bp. Hall.) The apostle’s infallible exposition, however, seems to include the whole ministration of angels, and to confine the verse to that subject; whence we learn that the holy angels are swift as the wind in obeying the commands of the Lord; and as a flame of fire with love and zeal.

V. 5. The great Creator so formed the earth, and ordered every thing respecting it; as to provide effectually, that it should preserve its relative situation in the universe, and its regular course without deviation, until the appointed time for its final dissolution.

V. 6-9. In the beginning the waters covered the whole chaotic mass; so that no mountains appeared above them: but at the voice of the Creator, which was as thunder, they hasted away. "And the mountains ascend, and the valleys descend to the place which thou hast established for them.—Thou hast set them" (the waters), "a bound which they shall not pass; they shall not return to cover the earth."—This is the old version: it accords with the Septuagint, and is more clear than the present translation. "Immediately the dry land was seen, part of which, by thy wonderful contrivance, O LORD, rose up in lofty hills; the rest sunk down in lowly valleys; where thou hast cut channels for the waters to run into the main ocean, the place thou hast appointed for them: and there, though they restlessly toss and swell, yet they cannot get over the shores, wherein thou hast enclosed them, nor shall they ever recover their former liberty, to overflow the earth again." (Bp. Patrick).—Upon thy command the waters sunk down into one place, so as the hills, (thereupon appearing,) seemed to ascend, and the valleys to go down to their settled hollowness: thither, by thy divine appointment, did the waters gather themselves, and there abide." (Bp. Hall).—Some suppose that the retiring of the waters after the deluge was meant; and the clauses "the waters stood above the mountains," and, "that they turn not again to cover the earth," seem to favour the interpretation. Yet the Psalmist is speaking of creation: and a single exception, (the miracle of the deluge, if alluded to,) does not abrogate the general rule which is often spoken of. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10, 11. "The waters of the sea are not only prevented from destroying the earth, but, by a wonderful machinery, are rendered the means of preserving every living thing which moveth thereon. Partly ascending from the great deep, through the strata of the earth, partly exhaled in vapour from the surface of the ocean into the air, and from thence falling in rain, especially on the tops and by the sides of mountains, they break forth in fresh springs, having left their salts behind them;

they trickle through the valleys, between the hills, receiving fresh supplies as they go; and after watering by their innumerable windings immense tracts of country, they return to the place from which they came. Thus every animal hath an opportunity of quenching that thirst which must otherwise put a period to its existence. (Note, Gen. i. 9.) "The wild asses," are especially mentioned; because they live in remote and sandy deserts; yet they are, by the God of nature, taught the way to the waters; insomuch that the parched traveller findeth them to be the best guides in the world; and needeth only to follow the herds of them descending to the streams." (Horne.)

V. 12. By the springs of waters, in the valleys, the birds delight to build their nests; and concealed in the branches of the trees, to pour out their cheerful notes.—The music of birds was the first song of thanksgiving which was offered from the earth, before man was formed. All their sounds are different, but all harmonious; and all together compose a choir which we cannot imitate." (Wesley.)

V. 13. "As for the hills, which constantly enrich the lower grounds, He waters them from the regions above; whence dews distil, and showers of rain come pouring down." (Bp. Patrick.) Thus the whole earth is satisfied and enriched, by "the fruit" or effects of the Lord's most wonderful contrivance.

V. 14, 15. "He describeth God's provident care over man, who doth not only provide necessary things for him, as herbs and other meat; but also things to rejoice and comfort him, as wine, and oil, and ointments."—Under the word herb, all kinds of corn, pulse, and vegetable food are comprised; and likewise the produce of the vineyards and olive-yards.—(Marg. Ref.)

V. 16. The largest trees, and most flourishing, as the cedars of Lebanon, grow without man's care. They are, both on this account, and also by reason of their vast size, "the trees of the LORD," which "he hath planted;" yet by no means comparable to "the trees of righteousness," "the planting of the LORD, that he might be glorified."

V. 17, 18. The kind and condescending attention of the omnipotent Creator, to the meanest of his creatures, as thus introduced along with his special regard to man, is very beautiful and affecting to a serious mind. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 19. The Psalmist next celebrates the wisdom of God, in the motions and revolution of the heavenly bodies. The moon divides time by months, and its changes divide the months also: the seasons of the year were anciently computed by moons, and the Jewish festivals were fixed in the same manner. 'The sun, or solar light,—seemeth to know the exact time of its coming on, and going off, and fulfilleth the course prescribed to it without the least deviation.' (Horne.)

V. 20—23. The bountiful and wise Creator hath so ordered it, that the beasts of prey naturally shun the light, and seldom leave their dens till it is dark, and man be retired to his rest: so that there is no great danger from them, even in the regions where they most abound, except in the night-time. Then they range abroad, and, in their way, seek their meat from God, till the sun ariseth, and man returns to his work, and then they retire to their dens. Wicked men, who choose darkness, as best suited to the commission of their crimes with secrecy and impunity, and who hate the light of God's word because their deeds are evil, resemble the savage beasts, in this and many other respects. As do they also who spend the night in revels and dissipation, and retire to rest when they ought to set about some useful employment: for thus they seem to renounce their kindred to the human species, and to be ambitious of a relation to the wild beasts of the forest. In nations, who sit in darkness for want of revelation, Satan seems to have permission to range and devour at pleasure: but when the Sun of Righteousness ariseth, this roaring lion has his power diminished, and men are stirred up to "labour for the meat, which endureth unto everlasting life."

V. 24. 'Transported with the survey—the Psalmist breaks forth into an exclamation, (and what heart has not already anticipated him?) on the variety and magnificence, the harmony and proportion of the works of God, in this visible—perishable world. What then are the miracles of grace and glory! What are those invisible and eternal things, which God hath prepared for them that love him!' (Horne.)

V. 25, 26. The word rendered wide, signifies literally, spacious of both hands, being dual. 'This great and spacious sea also, which seems to embrace the earth in its arms, is no less full of thy wonderful works.' (Bp. Patrick.) 'There is not in all nature a more august and striking object than the ocean. Its inhabitants are as numerous as those upon the land; nor is the wisdom and power of the Creator less displayed, perhaps, in their formation and preservation; from the smallest fish that swims, to the enormous tyrant of the deep, the leviathan himself. By means of navigation, Providence has opened a communication between the most distant parts of the globe; the largest solid bodies are wafted, with incredible swiftness, upon one fluid by the impulse of another, and seas join the countries which they appear to divide.' (Horne.) 'There the ships sail as swiftly as the fishes swim; fetching us the riches both of sea and land; and there that great leviathan, finds room enough to tumble up and down, and sport himself in his absolute dominion over all that the sea contains.' (Bp. Patrick.) Many authors, and among the rest Bishop Patrick, in commenting on Job, suppose the leviathan to mean the crocodile: but the text before us, so fully decides the leviathan to be an inhabitant of the sea, that this respectable author paraphrases it in direct opposition to his exposition of the Scripture before referred to! The word rendered things creeping, is used concerning the fishes, in the history of the creation: and as none of them, properly speaking, have legs and feet, and many of them, in great measure lie and crawl at the bottom of the water; there is a propriety in considering them as a peculiar species of reptiles.

31 ^m The glory of the LORD shall endure for ever: ⁿ the LORD shall rejoice in his works.

32 He ^o looketh on the earth, and it trembleth: ^p he toucheth the hills, and they smoke.

33 ^q I will sing unto the LORD as long as I live: I will sing praise to my God, while I have my being.

34 My ^r meditation of him shall be sweet: ^s I will be glad in the LORD.

35 Let ^t the sinners be consumed out of the earth, and let the wicked be no more. ^u Bless thou the LORD, O my soul. Praise ye the LORD.

V. 27—30. The vast creation, forming one great family, maintained upon the riches and bounty of JEHOVAH, as the great householder, is a very striking idea: whilst at his will one generation of creatures perish, a new generation succeeds; and successive crops of vegetable productions renew and cover the face of the earth. The twenty-eighth verse may be literally rendered, "Thou wilt give them; they will gather: Thou wilt open thine hand; they shall be satisfied with good." The Holy Spirit seems to be spoken of in Scripture, as the immediate agent in giving and preserving life, both natural, spiritual, and eternal.

V. 31. The old version here is, "Glory be to the LORD for ever; let the LORD rejoice in his works." Our present translation is more literal: but the variation shows, that no certain rule has been adopted, in rendering such passages; and that the context in general must determine in which sense we should understand them. (Note, Gen. i. 31.)

V. 32. ^r At his presence the earth trembleth, and the mountains, (as our fathers saw at mount Sinai,) are full of fire and smoke. (Bp. Patrick.) It is probable, however, that earthquakes and volcanos, as terrific displays of the Creator's power, (in whatever way men account for them,) were also intended: and perhaps the last general conflagration.

V. 33. While I have my being. Or, "Till I be no more," that is, on earth.

V. 35. Let, &c. Or, "The sinners shall be consumed, &c." Thus the Psalmist concludes as he began: "Bless thou the LORD, O my soul;" only calling on all that read and sing the psalm, and on all creatures, to join with him in praising the eternal and glorious God of heaven and earth.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Every object, which we behold or reflect on, may remind us to bless and praise the Lord, who is very great, and arrayed with majesty, glory, and excellency, infinitely surpassing our comprehension. "His eternal power and God-head" are clearly seen by the things which he hath made: his glory, like the sun, becomes visible by its own splendour; and they are without excuse, who do not love, and thank, and worship him. The heavens stretched forth as his curtain, the light as his magnificent garment; the clouds as his chambers, or his chariot; the winds and flames as his servants and messengers; and the holy angels, executing his commands with inconceivable zeal, alacrity, and promptitude, are so many demonstrations of his power and authority; and show that all his creatures serve him, apostate spirits, and apostate man alone excepted. The less we can comprehend of the manner in which the Creator retains the earth in its course, and the seasons in their order, the more we should admire and adore his power, wisdom, and goodness: and whilst we consider the numerous and invaluable advantages which we derive from the ocean, and from the wonderful manner in which the earth is watered from the great reservoir; we should remember to bless the Lord for his faithfulness to Noah and his posterity. We may likewise observe the wisdom, love, and power of God in the instinctive propensities of all animals; by which they are not only led to the means of their own preservation, and the continuance of each species, but are rendered subservient to our comfort and benefit. When we reflect on the provision, which the bounteous Creator hath made for the wants of all his creatures, we should also notice the natural worship, so to speak, which they render unto him; whilst the feathered songsters warble his praise, and even the lions, roaring in the woods, seek their meat from God. Yet man, forgetful and ungrateful man, is favoured with the largest measure of his kindness: to him he giveth all things richly to enjoy; not only bringing food out of the earth, but wine and oil for his exhilaration and pleasure. He hath put the animal tribes under his dominion; even those which render him no service, stand in awe of him, and are taught to retire to their dens, when the rising sun calls him to his work; and in general they only venture forth, when night hath drawn her sable curtain to favour his repose. Well then may we break forth in admiration, and say, "O LORD, how manifold are thy works! in wisdom hast thou made them all; the earth is full of thy riches!" For the seas and the dry land, the air, and even the bowels of the earth, are abundantly replenished with useful treasures for the service of man. Yet let us remember that we are pensioners, and, in some sense, fellow-commoners with the inferior creatures; which all wait upon the Lord, who "giveth them their meat in due season; which gather what he giveth," and are examples to us of contentment and moderation. Let us also recollect that death, which sweeps away the innumerable multitudes of living creatures that people the earth, and makes room for successive generations, first entered by man's sin; and likewise that we are not sent into the world, as leviathan into the great deep, to play therein; either by living merely for amusement or by preying upon our inferiors. We have much to do; we are sentenced to eat our bread in the sweat of our brow; and he who does nothing useful to society, lives upon the labour of others. We ought, therefore, to work out our salvation, to improve our talents, and to serve our generation, from the morning to the evening of our lives:

PSALM CV.

An exhortation to praise God, to make known his works, to glory in him, and to seek his favour, 1—7. A brief history of God's goodness to his people from the call of Abraham, to the settlement of Israel in Canaan, 8—45.

O ^a GIVE thanks unto the LORD; ^b call upon his name: ^c make known his deeds among the people.

² ^d Sing unto him, sing psalms unto him: ^e talk ye of all his wondrous works.

³ ^f Glory ye in his holy name; ^g let the heart of them rejoice that seek the LORD.

⁴ ^h Seek the LORD and ⁱ his strength: ^j seek his face evermore.

⁵ ^k Remember his marvellous works that he hath done; his wonders, and ^l the judgments of his mouth;

⁶ ^m O ⁿ ye seed of Abraham his servant, ye children of Jacob ^o his chosen.

⁷ He is ^p the LORD our God: ^q his judgments are in all the earth.

⁸ ^r He hath remembered his covenant for ever, the word which he commanded to ^s a thousand generations:

⁹ Which ^t covenant he made with Abraham, and his oath unto Isaac;

¹⁰ And confirmed the same unto Jacob for a law, and to Israel for ^u an everlasting covenant:

¹¹ Saying, ^v Unto thee will I give the land of Canaan, the ^w lot of your inheritance:

¹² When they were ^x but ^y a few men in number; yea, very few, ^z and strangers in it.

¹³ When they went from one nation to another, from one kingdom to another people;

¹⁴ ^a He suffered no man to do them wrong; yea, he reprov'd kings for their sakes;

¹⁵ Saying, ^b Touch not ^c mine anointed, and do ^d my prophets no harm.

¹⁶ Moreover ^e he called for a famine upon the land: ^f he brake the whole staff of bread.

we thankfully receive, and moderately use and fear to abuse the bounty of Providence; whilst we learn to trust in him who feeds the young lions, assured that he will not desert his children; let us fix our attention and choice on “that good part, which shall never be taken from us:” and not only let us show our gratitude by fervent songs of praise; but by devoting ourselves to the service of our God, and imitating his liberality and mercy, as we have opportunity and ability.

NOTES.

PSALM CV. V. 1. (Notes, 1 Chr. xvi. 8—22.) ‘The first part of this psalm at least was made by David:—and it is most probable that he afterwards enlarged it; (for who else would adventure to do it?) that it might be a more complete commemoration of all the mercies of God toward their nation.’ (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 2. ‘Music and conversation are two things, by which the mind of man receiveth much good, or a great deal of harm. They who do in reality love the Saviour, will always find themselves inclined to sing of him, and to talk of him.’ (Horne.)

V. 8. (2 Chr. xvi. 15.) In the passage referred to, the Psalmist exhorts the people to be mindful of the covenant, which the Lord had made with their fathers: but here he teaches them to praise God for having always remembered it.

V. 15. Prophets. ‘Meaning the old fathers to whom God showed himself plainly, and who were setters forth of his word.’

V. 16. Famine is here figuratively spoken of as the servant of God, which at his call promptly attends to fulfil his righteous will. Bread is called the staff, or the support of life; and the experience of seasons in which corn is very scarce and dear, though short of absolute famine, gives a very affecting and distressing exposition of the phrase.

V. 17. The word translated a man, is in some versions rendered an eminent man: Joseph was an eminent character, though envied by his brethren, and sold for a slave: he was a great deliverer, and one of the most illustrious types of the Saviour, in the whole Old Testament. “When God purposed to call for a famine in the land,” he had sent an extraordinary man into Egypt, to make provision for Jacob’s family; and Joseph’s brethren “meant it for evil, but God meant it for good.”

V. 18. It seems by this, that Joseph was very severely used, when first imprisoned by Potiphar. (Notes, &c. Gen. xxxvii. xxxix.)

V. 19. “Until his appointed time came; and the counsel of the LORD had tried him.” (Old Ver.) The word which Joseph spoke, as from God, when he interpreted the dreams of the chief baker and chief butler, was reported to Pharaoh; and when Joseph had interpreted Pharaoh’s extraordinary dream too, he was not only released, but likewise advanced to the highest dignity. But till this time arrived, Joseph continued in prison, according to the word, or the counsel and decree of God; that he might be tried as gold is tried in the furnace. (lxvi. 10—12. 1 Pet. i. 6, 7.)

V. 22. “That he should bind his princes to his will.” (Old Ver.) The clause seems rather to denote the efficacious means used by Pharaoh, to secure the obedience of his princes to Joseph, than any severe measures used by Joseph to punish the disobedient, or any arbitrary use of his high authority. The Septuagint thus renders the verse: “That he should instruct his princes even as himself; and make his elders wise.” (Notes, Gen. xl. xli.)

V. 23—25. (Notes, Gen. xlv. xlvii. 1.) At first the Egyptians were friends to Jacob’s family, for Joseph’s sake: but after the death of Joseph and his patron, and the succession of another king who knew not Joseph, the Egyptians became enemies to Israel. Their rapid increase from a single family to a powerful people, excited envy, jealousy, dread, and hatred; which prompted both the king and his subjects to devise politic and detestable measures of diminishing their numbers and strength, and of retaining them in bondage. (Notes, Ex. 1.) And as the events which had taken place, by the providential appointment of God, gave occasion to this change in the disposition of the Egyptians; as he foresaw and had predicted, that this would be the case; and as he determined to leave them to themselves and the natural tendency of their depraved hearts, in such circumstances; it is said, “He turned their hearts,” &c. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 28. They, &c. Moses and Aaron boldly executed their commission, in every particular. “They feared not the wrath of the king; but endured as seeing Him that is invisible.” They were sent, like Ezekiel, to deliver the message of God to haughty rebels; and were careful not to imitate their rebellion. Some, however, explain the clause of the Egyptians, reading it as an interrogation. “Did they not rebel against his word?” Did they not persist in rebelling, amidst all the plagues inflicted on them? (Notes, Ex. ii—xv.)

1 lxxviii. 51. 36 ¹ He smote also all the first-born in their land, ^m the chief of all their strength.

V. 37. 'Among such a number of men, women, children, and cattle, nothing was weak and feeble, nothing unable to perform the journey. The order was that "not a hoof should be left behind;" and He, who commanded, gave strength to obey.' (Horne.)

V. 42. The Psalmist here records the goodness of God to Israel, without noticing Israel's ingratitude and rebellion, which form in a great measure the subject of the ensuing psalms. Yet he intimates in this verse, that the Lord conferred all these benefits on them, entirely from regard to their ancestor Abraham his friend; "and to the word of "his holiness," which he had spoken to Abraham. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 45. Many of the laws given to Israel were of such a nature that they could not be obeyed in the wilderness, or at a distance from the sanctuary: so that there was a special reason why they must inhabit Canaan, in order to observe the statutes, and obey the laws, of God: but in general all their religious advantages, and all the favours bestowed on them, were expressly vouchsafed, in order to separate them from other nations, and to render them the obedient worshippers of the true God.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Our meditations on the works of the Creator, and on the providential goodness of God, should lead us to consider his special love to his chosen people; that we may have more enlarged views of his glory, and be more enlivened in admiring love and gratitude. Whilst ungodly men, by their vain songs and corrupt conversation, inflame one another's passions; Christians should edify each other, by singing the praises of God, and by talking of all his wondrous works: and the New Testament furnishes us with more sublime and interesting subjects, than even the history of Israel's deliverance from Egypt, and settlement in the promised land. Let believers then glory in his holy name; let sinners seek his face; and let us all remember the Redeemer's "marvellous works, his wonders, and the "judgments of his mouth." The Lord hath indeed remembered his covenant with Abraham, in raising up his promised "Seed, in whom all the families of the earth "shall be blessed;" and we Gentiles are in Him become a chosen generation to show forth his praise: (1 Pet. ii. 9, 10.) Indeed true Christians are hitherto but few in number, and strangers and pilgrims upon earth; yet a far better inheritance than that of Canaan is ensured to them, by the oath and covenant of God: and if we have the unction of the Holy Spirit, no kings or people can do us harm; but our God will reprove the greatest of those who so much as attempt to injure us. We greatly mistake, if we do not rank afflictions among our mercies: as they tend to prove the reality of our faith and love, to humble our pride, to wean us from the world, to quicken our prayers, to enlarge our experience of the Lord's faithfulness to his promises, to encourage our dependence, to bow our hearts into submission, and to soften them into compassion to our brethren. When the Lord calls, famines obey his word; and by withholding bread he breaks the staff of life, to punish the iniquities of guilty nations, and to exercise the faith and patience of his people. But he will assuredly provide for those that trust in him: and he often previously makes arrangements, in order to supply those wants of which his servants had no foresight. Thus, in his foreknowledge of our lost estate, long before we had an existence, he appointed his beloved Son, whom Joseph typified, to be our Redeemer. In the fulness of time he appeared on earth in the form of a servant; and though perfectly holy, he was accused of grievous crimes, treated with the utmost insult, crucified, and laid in the grave; and by these sufferings he paid the ransom of our souls. At the appointed time the bands of death were loosed, and by his resurrection he was fully justified from all that had been charged upon him: he was then exalted by the right hand of the Father, to the mediatorial throne; all the treasures of grace and salvation are entirely at his disposal; and perishing sinners come to him, and are relieved from his inexhaustible stores. But with this example in view, we can expect nothing else, than humiliation and hardship, before honour and usefulness on earth, and complete felicity in heaven. We should then prepare for the cross, and for the hatred of the world: we should submit to the will of our God, and wait his time, and commit our all to his disposal: and in the depth of our distress the case of Joseph also may teach us to hope for speedy and important changes in our circumstances, even in this present world. Nor is

PSALM CVI.

The Psalmist praises God, admires the happiness of his people, and prays to partake of it, 1—5. He recapitulates Israel's provocations, from their bondage in Egypt, to the time when they were settled in Canaan, and imitated the idolatries of the Canaanites, 6—46. He concludes with prayer and praise, 47, 48.

it improper to observe, that Jesus hath power to bind kings and princes at his will; and that he alone can teach senators true wisdom. As the believer commonly is most prosperous in his soul, when under the cross; so the church hath often flourished most in holiness and increased in number, under oppression and persecution. But the image and favour of God are sure to excite the enmity of wicked men; whose hearts will thus be turned to hate his servants, and to join force with subtlety to destroy them: and that which ungodly counsellors think a wise political measure, often proves, on examination, to be a most detestable project of the devil against the church of Christ. Yet instruments shall be raised up for her good suited to her emergencies; and multiplied plagues may be expected by obstinate persecutors, who persist in their rebellion under the gentler strokes of God's correcting rod. The whole creation is ready to rise up in arms against his enemies; and when he gives the word, every thing will concur to render them contemptible and miserable. He will fulfil his largest promises to his people, and make them a terror to those who hate them: and all the benefits conferred on Israel, as a nation, were only shadows of the spiritual blessings with which he hath blessed us in Jesus Christ. Having redeemed us with his blood, enriched us from his treasures, restored our souls to health and holiness, and set us at liberty from Satan's bondage; he guides and guards us all the way, he satisfies our souls with the Bread of heaven, and with the Water of life from the Rock of salvation, and will bring us safe to our incorruptible inheritance. But let it never for a moment be forgotten, that the Lord, by all he doeth for us, intends to teach, incline, and enable us, to "ob-serve his statutes, and keep his laws;" and to show forth his praise, first here on earth, and then in heaven for ever; and that he "redeems his servants from all iniquity, and purifies them unto himself, a peculiar people, zealous of good works."

NOTES.

PSALM CVI. V. 1. Praise ye the LORD. Hallelujah. There is little doubt, but this is the title of the Psalm,—whereby the author excites them to acknowledge God's bounty to their ungrateful forefathers. (Bp.
Patrick.) Many commentators affix a very late date to this

2 ° Who can utter the mighty acts of the LORD? who can shew forth ^d all his praise?

3 ° Blessed are they that ^f keep judgment, and he that ^g doeth righteousness ^h at all times.

4 ° Remember me, O LORD, with the favour that thou bearest unto thy people: O ^k visit me with thy salvation;

5 That ⁱ I may see the good of thy chosen, that I may ^m rejoice in the gladness of thy nation, that ⁿ I may glory with thine inheritance.

psalm; supposing it to have been written during the Babylonish captivity, or even so long after as the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes. But the concluding verses, on which they ground that opinion, are found for substance in the psalm which was used when David removed the ark to mount Zion; as is likewise this first verse. (Notes, 1 Chr. xvi. 32—36.) Indeed this seems to be an appendix to the preceding psalm: for as that celebrated the mercies of God to Israel; so this confesses and deplores the rebellions of Israel against God. 'The prophet exhorteth the people to praise God for his past benefits, that thereby their minds may be strengthened against all present troubles and despair.'

V. 2. 'When you glorify the LORD, exalt him as much as you can: for even yet he will far exceed: and when you exalt him, put forth your whole strength, and be not weary; for you can never go far enough.' (Ecclesiasticus.)

V. 3. The Israelites had been put in possession of Canaan, by the immediate power of JEHOVAH, "that they might keep his statutes, and observe his laws;" and they would have been very happy, if they had thus "kept judgment, and done righteousness at all times;" that is, if they had persevered in attendance on the ordinances, and in obedience to the commandments, of God. But though Israel, as a nation, had lost much of their prosperity by sin; yet every individual, who thus ordered his conduct, was and would be happy. No mere man indeed obeys God perfectly: yet every true believer makes this his constant aim, nor shall we ever be perfectly happy till we are perfectly obedient; that is, till fully delivered from sin and all its consequences.

V. 4, 5. The Psalmist well understood the difference between the nation of Israel, and the true Israelites found among them. He was one of that nation, and shared all its external privileges: but his desire and prayer was, that he might be remembered with the favour shown to the true people of God, and visited with their salvation; and that he might see, and share the blessings, and the joy, and the triumphs, of those who are indeed a chosen generation, a holy nation, and the Lord's highly valued inheritance. (Notes, Rom. ix. 6—9. 1 Pet. ii. 9, 10.)—Many expositors understand these verses merely of the 6 ¶ We have ^o sinned with our fathers, we have committed iniquity; we have done wickedly.

7 ¶ Our fathers understood not thy wonders in Egypt; ^a they remembered not ^r the multitude of thy mercies; but ^s provoked him at the sea, even at the Red sea.

8 Nevertheless ^t he saved them for his name's sake, ^u that he might make his mighty power to be known.

9 He ^{*} rebuked the Red sea also, and it was dried up: ^v so he led them through the depths as through the wilderness.

10 And ^z he saved them from the hand of him that hated them, and ^a redeemed them from the hand of the enemy.

11 And ^b the waters covered their enemies; there was not one of them left.

17 ^l The earth opened and swallowed up Dathan, and covered the company of Abiram.

18 And ^m a fire was kindled in their company; the flame burned up the wicked.

19 ¶ They ⁿ made a calf in Horeb, and worshipped the molten image.

20 Thus ^o they changed their glory ^p into the similitude of an ox that eateth grass.

21 They ^q forgot ^r God their Saviour, ^s which had done great things in Egypt;

22 ^t Wondrous works in the land of Ham, and ^u terrible things by the Red sea.

HOVAH; no steady reliance on his power, wisdom, truth, and love; no submission to his will, or preparation for self-denying obedience: and therefore in time of temptation they fell away, having no root in themselves; and when their wishes were thwarted, they murmured, rebelled, forgot the works of God, would not wait for his counsel; but lusted exceedingly in the wilderness, and tempted God by their unbelief. (Notes, &c. Ex. xv. xvi. xix.)

V. 15. Instead of being benefited by the abundance of the quails sent them; the Israelites surfeited through excess, and multitudes died by disease. (Notes, Num. xi.) — “They knew not what they asked,” or “what manner of spirit they were of:” and their sensual request was granted as a punishment.

V. 16—18. (Notes, Num. xii. xvi.)

V. 19—23. (Notes, Ex. xxxii. xxxiv.) “All idolaters renounce God to be their glory, when instead of him they worship any creature.” “It is to be hoped, that we shall never see a time, when the miracle of our redemption shall be forgotten;—and when the people shall solicit their teachers to fabricate a new philosophical deity for them to worship, instead of the God of their ancestors.” (Horne.) The place, even Horeb, where the Israelites made and worshipped the calf; and all the preceding miracles of mercy to them, and judgment on their enemies, which they had witnessed, constituted so many highly aggravating circumstances of their base and ungrateful conduct: and by parity of reason, is not the idolatry of professed Christians, especially of such as have access to temporal felicity promised to Israel when obedient: but that was only a shadow of the spiritual and eternal blessings ensured to the elect of God; and scarcely any passage of the New Testament breathes out a more fervent longing after those spiritual blessings. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6. “We are no better than our forefathers; but have offended after their example, by which we ought to have been amended. We are guilty of many iniquities against one another, and much impiety against thee.” (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 7. The Israelites in general did not so understand the miracles wrought for them in Egypt, as to expect deliverance from the love and power of God; nor were they suitably impressed or affected by what they had heard and seen, when pursued by the Egyptians to the banks of the Red sea: so that they soon provoked the Lord by their unbelief and distrustful murmurs. (Notes, Ex. xiv.)

V. 8. “He gave them a new deliverance, that the world might not imagine he wanted power to complete what he had begun to do for them.” (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 12. The faith of the Israelites was exactly the same, as is represented by the seed sown upon stony ground, and widely different from that which springs up in a broken penitent heart. They were surprised, gratified, and delighted, by their unexpected escape and the destruction of their enemies: and they experienced a mighty flow of natural joy and gratitude, such as may be observed in children when they are humoured. But there was no humiliation for sin: no abiding apprehensions of the glorious perfections of JEthe oracles of God, proportionably more heinous and inexcusable, than that of poor benighted pagans? The idolatry of papists, than that of the Chinese?—Moses stood before God, in behalf of Israel, by fervent prayer: but when he stood before Israel, protesting against their wickedness, and executing judgment on the idolaters; he was equally employed for the good of the nation, and his exertions were equally efficacious in preventing their destruction.

V. 24-27. (Notes, Num. xlii. xiv.) ‘He solemnly swear, that not one of that wicked generation should ever come into Canaan: but all perish in the wilderness.’ (Bp. Patrick.)—The prophetic threatenings in the twenty-sixth of Leviticus, the twenty-eighth of Deuteronomy, and other parts of the books of Moses, which are fulfilling at this day, seem also to be referred to. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 28-31. (Notes, Num. xxv.) “The sacrifices of the dead,” were such as the idolaters offered to lifeless images, or in honour of their deceased warriors and rulers.—The word rendered “executed judgment,” means also prayed, and is so translated in the common Prayer-book: but the conduct of Phinehas, as recorded by Moses, shows that the translation here used is proper. He interposed, not merely by prayer, but as a magistrate, by punishing two most daring and audacious criminals. The Septuagint renders it, “He made atonement.” ‘This act declared his lively faith, and for his faith’s sake was accepted.’

V. 32, 33. (Notes, Num. xx.) “The wrath of man” found admission, and that “worketh not the righteousness of God.” Thou, blessed Jesus, art the only perfect pattern of patience and love! O grant to all, but above all, to the pastors of thy flock, a spirit not easy

‘to be provoked, and lips not hasty to speak unadvisedly.’ (Horne.) ‘If so notable a prophet of God escape not punishment, though others provoked him to sin; how much more shall they be subject to God’s judgment, who cause God’s children to sin.’

V. 34. God commissioned Israel to execute his righteous sentence of extermination on the Canaanites, who had filled up the measure of their crimes: and while many in every age declaim against them for the supposed cruelty of their conduct in this respect; they are every where in Scripture charged with guilt, for sparing those whom God had doomed to death; and their crime was awfully punished by its consequences.

V. 37, 38. (Note, Deut. xxxii. 17.) No instance is recorded in which the Israelites were guilty of this most horrid crime, till long after the days of David; and this circumstance seems to favour the opinion, that the psalm was composed by some other person, during the captivity. The Israelites, however, in the days of the judges, might imitate the idolaters among whom they lived, in this, as well as in their other abominations; though it is not expressly recorded. And no allusion is made in any part of the psalm to the rebellions and idolatries of the kings of Judah or of Israel, to the golden calves worshipped by the latter, or to the profanations of the temple by the former: yet these are prominent subjects, in the enumeration given by other inspired writers of the crimes which provoked God to cast off Israel, and to punish Judah by the Babylonish captivity; and would scarcely have been passed over in entire silence, if the psalm had been written after those events. Indeed, it would be wonderful, in that case, that nothing should be said either about the temple or Jerusalem, or any of the kings of Judah, good or bad.

V. 39. (Notes, Lev. xx. 2-6.)

V. 40-45. The history contained in the book of Judges, and in the former part of the first book of Samuel; and especially those parts of it which are referred to in the margin, form a sufficient comment on these verses.

V. 46. Had the several nations, into whose hands God successively sold Israel for their sins, determined on extirpating them, as they had in part served the Canaanites, there was in many instances nothing sufficient to hinder them: but the Lord inclined the hearts of the conquerors to compassionate their slaves and captives, and thus the effects of their vehement resentment were prevented. The Israelites, being pitied, were only impoverished and enslaved, and not destroyed.

V. 47, 48. (Note, 1 Chr. xvi. 35, 36.) If David did not write this psalm, but it was composed by some prophet during the captivity: he took this passage from David's psalm, and applied it to the state of the Jews in his own time. Indeed the words are very applicable to the present condition of the Jews; and will doubtless be used by them, when the veil shall be taken from their hearts, and they shall turn to the Lord. 'Let the great LORD of all the world, who 'has been so gracious to Israel as to choose them for his 'own peculiar people, be most heartily blessed and praised. 'Let all generations bless him, as long as the world shall 'last, and to eternity: and let all his people concur in 'these desires, and wish it may be so. Let them all praise 'the LORD, and desire that he may be praised.' (Bp. Patrick.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-27.

None of our sins or sufferings should prevent our ascribing glory and praise to the Lord, and thanking him for his undeserved and everlasting goodness and mercy: indeed the more unworthy we are, the more admirable is his kindness, in continuing to us any of our comforts and hopes. "But 'who can utter the mighty acts of the LORD, or show 'forth all his praise!" This as much exceeds our ability, as it does to fulfil the whole of his righteous law without any defect or failure: yet they who depend on the Redeemer's righteousness, will copy the example of his persevering obedience, and endeavour, both by word and deed, to show forth his praises as they are able. These are indeed a happy people; for sin is the only cause of all the misery in the universe: how absurd then is it for men to amuse themselves with the notion of a religion, which they fancy will save and bless them, without rendering them obedient to the will of God!—Though multitudes abuse their outward privileges, and many professed Christians run into extravagant sentiments and inconsistent practices: yet God hath a people in every age, who enjoy his favour and experience the power and comfort of his salvation; whom he hath chosen to himself, and to whom he will do good; who are holy and happy under his government and protection: and for whom gladness and victory, and eternal glory are reserved. Let us pray earnestly and constantly to be thus remembered and distinguished, and to participate their privileges and felicity. We shall not be excluded from this favour, though "we have sinned with our fathers and "done very wickedly," if indeed we are truly humbled for our iniquities. But when man is left to himself, no miracles, mercies, warnings, or judgments will deeply or durably influence his heart to trust and serve the Lord. We have then no right to charge our misery upon our fathers' sins, seeing we have copied and perhaps exceeded them: rather we should be humbled to reflect how we arise, one generation after another, "an increase of sinful "men, to provoke the LORD to anger:" so that, if he did not save us for his own name's sake, and to the praise of his glorious power and grace, we should all perish without remedy. In reviewing our past lives, we shall often find that the timing of our rebellions has exceedingly aggravated the guilt of them. We have perhaps distrusted the Lord, after having just before experienced his merciful interpositions in our favour. When remarkable deliverances have excited a transient joy and gratitude, we have speedily forgotten all, and relapsed into our murmurs and disobedience. Under distress of conscience, we have perhaps been ready to say to the Lord, 'Save our souls, and deal with us in all other things as thou pleasest:' yet it may be ere long we have grown impatient of poverty and hardship, have lusted after some worldly indulgence, and tempted instead of trusting his Providence: and thus have we provoked him to send leanness into our souls, or to inflict severe corrections upon us to bring us to a sense of our folly. We cannot but know that we have often given way to envy, ambition, and self-preference: and instead of sitting down quietly in the lowest place of his church, (which is far too good for such vile sinners;) and rejoicing in the gifts and usefulness of his saints and ministers; we have been secretly repining, or openly reviling or censuring them. So that even the believer will see abundant cause to say, "It is of the Lord's mercies that I was not consumed," after the example of Korah and his company. Often have we, forgetful of the terrors of mount Sinai, and of the scene exhibited on mount Calvary, and of our marvellous deliverance from the hand of our enemy, been setting up idols in our hearts, and cleaving to some forbidden object: so that if a greater than "Moses had not stood in the breach to turn away the anger of the LORD," we should have provoked him to destroy us. And though we have not entirely disbelieved the word of God, or despised the heavenly inheritance: yet the feebleness of our desires, and the weakness of our faith, and our great eagerness about worldly things, have frequently argued a very perverse, ungrateful, and carnal frame of spirit. In short, we have put the patience of the Lord himself to trial, and no other could have borne with us; we have brought upon ourselves many rebukes and corrections; we have continual reason to join humiliation with our gratitude: and though the Lord has many a time delivered us, and renewed our comforts, yet we have again provoked him, and have been brought low for our iniquity. Still, however, mercy hath prevailed; He hath heard our prayers, remembered his covenant, and spared us for his name's sake.

V. 28—48.

If the real Christian's review of his past conduct affords so much ground for humiliation, the case of professed Christians is still worse. A great part of the visible church has forgotten God our Saviour, and turned aside to the worship of molten images, and saints, and angels; changing, like Israel, their glory into the similitude of their fellow-creatures. Vast multitudes seem desirous of discarding the God and Saviour of the Bible, and substituting in his place, a philosophical deity, not indeed the work of their own hands, but the creature of their own imaginations, and no more a just resemblance of JEHOVAH, than the golden calf was. Even among those who do not adopt such sentiments, we find conformity to the world, in its vainest and most criminal practices; the indulgence, instead of the mortification, of every carnal lust; nay, an imitation of the lewdness, excesses, extortions, oppressions, and cruelties of the heathen, even to the polluting of the lands where they live, with the blood of vast multitudes sacrificed to their avarice. And numbers train up their children in vanity and vice, and in contempt of every thing sacred; as if they meant that they should be devoted to Satan, and were determined to murder their precious souls. Whilst nations professing Christianity are openly and generally guilty of such enormities; no wonder that the wrath of the Lord is kindled against them; and if, after repeated deliverances, he brings them very low for their iniquities, except a general and deep repentance and works meet for repentance, intervene, there can be no prospect but of increasing calamities and confusion. It would be well if those who fill up the important stations of legislators and magistrates, were inspired with the intrepid zeal of Phinehas, to execute judgment upon daring criminals: this would be accounted to them for righteousness by the Judge of the world, however it were blamed by the criminals, or their abettors. And every one of us should imitate Moses, by standing in the breach to turn away the wrath of God from a guilty land; both by our earnest and persevering prayers, and by our zealous endeavours to promote reformation and the revival of true religion in our several circles. But it behooves us, in our zeal against sin, to watch over our own passions and expressions; lest we speak unadvisedly with our lips, and it should go ill with us also for their sakes. Our general duty is, however, the most pleasant, and the safest; and when many are left in any church or nation, who attend to these things, there remains a hope that God will turn away his wrath, and not destroy them. Let us then beseech him to separate his church, and to distinguish his professed people from the heathen, by his sanctifying grace; and to unite them in love, that they may give thanks unto his holy name, and triumph in his praise. Let us beseech him to bring again into his church the poor dispersed Jews: let us bless his name for our peculiar mercies, and desire that our God may be universally and everlastingly praised; and that all the people of the earth may say, Amen. Hallelujah.

NOTES.

PSALM CVII. V. 1-7. It is most probable that this psalm was composed by David, if he indeed were the author of the two preceding psalms : as those relate to the Lord's dealings with Israel : and this calls our attention to his providential care of mankind in general. But, whilst we primarily notice the literal sense, we shall also perceive that the instances which are selected are pictures or similitudes of the blessings pertaining to salvation. There seems in these verses some reference to the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, their wanderings in the desert, and their settlement in Canaan ; yet they do not exactly, or exclusively, apply to these events. The Israelites were not gathered out of the lands, from the east, west, north, and south : but they were redeemed from the power of Pharaoh ; and wandered in the wilderness, and hungered, and thirsted, and were led far round, yet in a right way ; (Notes, Deut. viii. ;) and at length were settled in a land where cities were ready prepared for them, and where they were abundantly satisfied with every earthly blessing. The case of travellers in those countries seems also referred to. A number of people, collected from all quarters, march together through the sandy deserts : where they are liable to be assaulted by free-booters, and are in danger of losing their way, or of perishing by hunger and thirst. But when they are in trouble, and call upon the Lord, he delivers them from their enemies and dangers, and guides them in his providence to the cities which they mean to inhabit. The words likewise exactly describe the case of those whom the Lord hath redeemed from the bondage of Satan, and collected from all parts of the earth ; who pass through the world as a perilous and dreary wilderness ; who are often ready to faint through troubles, fears, and temptations ; who learn to call upon the Lord in every danger and difficulty, and are guarded, fed, and refreshed. Till they at length arrive at that city which the Lord hath prepared for their habitation ; where their longing souls will be for ever satisfied with his goodness. Perhaps the recovery of the Jews from their dispersions was also predicted ; as the conclusion of the foregoing psalm seems peculiarly applicable to their present condition. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8, 9. "They shall acknowledge" (or "let them acknowledge,) to JEHOVAH, his mercy, and his wonders to the children of Adam, &c." The kindness and compassion of God to the sons of fallen Adam, in abundantly supplying their temporal wants, demands the return of admiring praise and thanksgiving : but his mercy, in providing for the spiritual wants of perishing sinners, and thus satisfying the longing soul, and filling the hungry soul with goodness, is most astonishing : and to eternity every one of the redeemed, with all his powers, will celebrate this goodness of the Lord, and his wonderful works to the sons of Adam. Though our translation is not strictly literal : yet the meaning of it is implied, and it has a peculiar animation, as repeated after every instance of the divine goodness and mercy.

V. 10-16. The Psalmist next selected the case of prisoners delivered from their confinement. We are led to conceive of persons shut up in a dark and unwholesome dungeon, barricadoed on every side by gates of brass and bars of iron, and loaded with galling fetters, condemned to die, and hourly expecting to be led to execution. This they are supposed to have merited by their crimes, having both violated the laws of man, and rebelled against the word of God. In this deplorable condition, bowed down with pain and anguish of spirit, they are represented as praying to the Lord ; and by his power over the hearts and affairs of men marvellously set at liberty. Multitudes through successive generations have doubtless experienced such an unmerited and unexpected escape : and the deliverance of the Jews from their captivity in Babylon, must occur to the mind of the attentive reader, with many particular instances recorded in Scripture. (Notes, 2 Chr. xxxiii. 13—16. Marg. Ref.)—But it is also a shadow of the sinner's deliverance from a far worse confinement. By rebellion against God men are brought under the condemnation of his holy law; and Satan, by means of their lusts, hath obtained dominion over them, and holds them fast in the most miserable bondage. This the awakened sinner discovers, and becomes sensible of his guilt, misery, and danger; and having struggled hard, but in vain, for deliverance, he finds there is no help for him but in the mercy and grace of God. For this he seeks by earnest prayer; and thus receives liberty and peace. Let us revert to the poor prisoner before described; if a free pardon be sent him, his chains are soon knocked off; the gates and bars of iron and brass fly open; the jailer hath no longer power to detain him; the gloom, horror, and despair of the dungeon are exchanged for the cheerful light of the sun and the wholesome air; the company of malefactors, the presence of the keeper, the rattling of chains, the expectation of the executioner with the implements of death, and the squalid attire of a prison, are changed for his own house, the society and congratulations of his friends and relatives, and all the comforts of liberty. All this is in a measure the case with the true Christian in this world: but at the resurrection, when the gates of the grave shall be thrown open, and sin and death shall be finally done with, his deliverance and his gratitude will together be perfected.

V. 17—20. The next selected case is that of recovery from sickness, when it hath been the effect of licentiousness, or iniquity: for though all diseases spring from sin, yet some are more immediately the effect of men's personal transgressions. The righteous providence of God hath connected several loathsome and dreadful diseases with different kinds of excessive or forbidden gratifications; yet men rush forward without regard to consequences: thus "Fools, because of their transgressions, are afflicted."

Loss of strength and of appetite are attended with excessive pain, and death presents itself before their affrighted minds: then the most profane will sometimes cry unto the Lord; and though their prayer is often the mere instinctive voice of distress, and only means "torment me not;" yet he frequently hears them, and unexpectedly restores their health and strength. Probably Christ by his powerful word healed some of this description when he was on earth: (John v. 14:) and all his miracles were emblematic of his healing the worse diseases of our souls. We are, as fallen creatures, prone to pride, ambition, envy, malice, covetousness, and sensual lusts: but most men exceedingly increase these fatal distempers by habits of indulgence. The convinced sinner knows that these maladies must terminate in misery, unless cured; and he finds by experience, that he can increase, but cannot remedy them: he even feels his carnal inclination recoil at those things which should be the nourishment of his soul, and he often apprehends that his destruction is inevitable. But he cries unto the Lord in this emergency, and by His word and Spirit his soul is gradually restored to health and holiness.

V. 23—30. The case of mariners is next selected. They transact their business upon the unstable and tempestuous ocean, and there witness scenes, and experience deliverances, of which others can scarcely form a conception. When, at His command whom the winds and waves obey, a storm ariseth; their situation becomes most tremendous, and it seems every moment as if the vessel must be swallowed up by the raging billows. In this perilous situation the most courageous are often dismayed: they are tossed about by the violent motion of the vessel, as if they staggered through drunkenness; and being baffled in all their efforts, "all their wisdom is swallowed up," and the most skilful and experienced are at a loss what further to do, to escape impending death. But when they call upon the Lord in their distress, they are often rescued, as from the very jaws of destruction, by the ceasing of the storm, or some unexpected way of escape; and their terror is succeeded by proportionable gladness, when they arrive safe at their destined harbour. This too may be a picture of those terrors and that distress of conscience, which many experience when they first apply their minds to religion: and of those deep scenes of trouble and temptation, which some, far more than others, pass through, in their subsequent course; in which, like Job, they seem to be set up as marks, at which Satan is permitted to shoot all his fiery darts; and by every suggestion to fill them with hard thoughts of God, and desperate conclusions concerning themselves. These are, like the mariner, exposed to tempests unknown to others; and are sometimes almost at their wits' end: yet in answer to their cries, the Lord turns their storms into a calm, and causes their trials to terminate in gladness and praise.

V. 31, 32. 'O that they who are thus unexpectedly preserved, would never forget to make their thankful acknowledgments to the LORD for his singular kindness; but every where proclaim what wonders he hath done for them! Let them magnify his power and goodness in the great assemblies of the people, especially in his temple. Let them praise him in the supreme court of the kingdom; that judges and governors may be excited to make Him their trust and confidence.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 33-43. The righteous Lord effects changes as he pleases, in the face of nature and the affairs of nations; drying up rivers, and turning well watered fertile countries into barren deserts, for the wickedness of their inhabitants. Thus Canaan itself is now remarkable for its sterility. On the contrary, other regions, which were barren and uncultivated, in the course of his providence become most fruitful and flourishing; where colonies of destitute person build cities, cultivate the lands, and are blessed and increased exceedingly. the church, and the preaching of the Gospel to the Gentiles, answer to this picture. The well-watered and fruitful soil is become dry and barren: while the wilderness is filled with pools of water and wells of salvation. (Marg. Ref.) The Gospel flourished for a time exceedingly amongst the Gentiles; but it has been brought low and minished, in different places, through oppression and persecution, and internal corruptions or divisions: yet contempt hath repeatedly been poured upon persecuting princes; and even upon such as, pretending friendship, have attempted to lord it over God's heritage; so that they have been bewildered and infatuated in their counsels, like men who have lost their way; whilst the poor and persecuted church of God has been revived from the dust, and again increased and prospered. This will be more eminently the case in future times, when the righteous will see it and rejoice, and iniquity will be silenced. In the mean while, the wise will notice these varied dispensations of Providence, and will learn to walk in those ways, in which the loving-kindness of the Lord may be understood and experienced. 'A truly wise person will treasure up in his heart the contents of this most instructive and delightful psalm. By so doing, he will fully understand—the weakness and wretchedness of man, and the loving-kindness of God; who, not for our merits, but for his mercy's sake, dispelleth our ignorance, breaketh off our sins, healeth our infirmities, preserveth us in temptations, placeth us in the church, enricheth us with his grace, sheltereth us from persecution, blesseth us in time, and will crown us in eternity.' (Horne.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-22.

Wherever we turn our thoughts, we perceive the effects

PSALM CVIII.

David earnestly praises God, 1—5. He

of the Lord's goodness and mercy, which should excite our grateful praises: but the redeemed alone will unfeignedly thank him even for providential benefits. The Bible instructs us, and faith will enable us, to perceive the hand of God in those events which unbelief ascribes to chance, to second causes, or subordinate agents. Whatever means or instruments are employed, the Lord is the great Agent. We should therefore mark his operations in the ordinary occurrences of life, and render him thanks for every instance of his kindness to us and to our connexions.—When we have been preserved or delivered from hostile invasions, and the assaults of robbers and assassins; when we are brought safe home from tedious or perilous journeys; when provided for with things needful for our bodies, or placed in convenient habitations, or enjoying domestic comforts; how good and right is it that we should “praise the LORD for his goodness, and for his wonderful works” to us, the sinful children of fallen Adam! But, alas! we are most apt to forget the hand of God, when every thing corresponds to our wishes: and therefore he brings us into trouble and danger, that we may feel our dependence, and call upon him for deliverance; and that, when our desires are granted, we may either render him our tribute of praise, or be left inexcusable in our neglect.—Sin is always to be considered as the source of all our troubles; which we might justly be left to struggle with, or to sink under, without help from that God, against whom we have rebelled, and whose counsel we have rejected. But there are many afflictions, that are genuine consequences of men's crimes. Such are especially, in most instances, the horrors of a prison, and the prospect of an ignominious death! Yet, alas, how many are in this dreadful situation, brought down with anguish of heart, and having none to help them! And when such persons unexpectedly obtain liberty and all its comforts, how should they praise the Lord for his goodness to them! Yet, alas! it is but seldom that their sorrows and terrors are productive of genuine humiliation before God, and fervent prayer unto him: and therefore they commonly return to their former courses, and only perish at last more inexcusable and unpitied. Thus also infatuated multitudes entail upon themselves months and years of disease and pain, by moments of licentious indulgence: and if, in answer to their cries of distress, the Lord bring them back from the gates of death, surely they should praise him for his goodness, and sacrifice to him the sacrifices of thanksgiving, with fervency equal to their great unworthiness of such favour, and proportioned to the consequences of dying in such a manner. Yet whilst thousands are cured in our hospitals and by various charities, as well as in other ways, of diseases contracted by licentiousness and excess: it is to be feared that, a very small number excepted, they generally manifest their ingratitude by returning to their former excess; and the event generally illustrates the benevolence as well as wisdom and piety of fervently exclaiming, “Oh, that they would praise the LORD for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men.”

ferently prays for help, and expects great success according to the promises of God to him, 6—13.

V. 23—43.

The perils to which seamen are exposed, are not commonly the effect of their own transgressions: but as they do their business in great waters, they see so much of the wonderful works of God, that their too general irreligion forms one of the most lamentable demonstrations of the depravity of the human heart. If we were strangers to these truths and facts, we should expect that they who had once beheld the storm arise in obedience to the Creator's will, and had experienced the horrors of the tremendous scene, which baffles all description, with that dismay and astonishment, which must be inseparable from the idea of being every moment liable to be swallowed up by the raging billows, without being able to do any thing to prevent it; who in their extreme distress had cried unto the Lord for help, and had in some marvellous manner been unexpectedly preserved, and restored in peace to their desired haven; that they would certainly unite fervent gratitude with their overflowing gladness; and not only employ their tongues, but spend the remnant of their days, to the glory of their great Preserver, “Exalting him in the congregation of the people, and praising him in the assembly of the elders.” This ought uniformly to be the case: but how evident is the general and awful reverse! Indeed the surprising changes, which are continually taking place in the affairs of nations, families, and individuals; whilst some are cast down from the summit of prosperity, and others advanced from the depth of adversity, evince our absolute dependence upon God in every thing, and show that neglect of him, or rebellion against him, are as unreasonable as they are wicked. The fertility and populousness of nations depend on his sovereign will, and he effects what changes he pleases, for the display of his justice, or his mercy. In his providence, a few poor hungry outcasts have often migrated into a waste howling wilderness, and have there been enabled to build cities, and to cultivate the before barren desert; and so have become prosperous, and multiplied exceedingly; yet, after a time perhaps affluence has introduced luxury and impiety; for their punishment they have been minished and brought low by oppression and public calamities. He, who set them up when afflicted and poor, pours contempt upon them when they are become powerful princes, and perhaps reduces them to their former abject state. The righteous, beholding these judgments of God, will rejoice in his just and gracious sovereignty: and thus, from time to time, iniquity receives a check, and infidelity stands confuted: and he that is truly wise will observe these things, and will be encouraged in trusting in, and waiting for, the loving-kindness of the Lord. But the same persons will see still more of the wisdom, power, and love of God, in his dealings with his church of redeemed sinners, whom he hath gathered from the east, the west, the north, and the south, to be unto him a peculiar people. Having redeemed them from the power of the enemy, he guides them through this desolate wilderness to his holy habitation.

Having caused them to hunger and thirst after righteousness, when they were ready to faint and perish, he supplied their wants from his abundant stores; he taught them to seek help from him, and will never leave them, till he hath fully satisfied their longing souls with his goodness. From bondage, terror, and the borders of despair, he brings them forth to liberty, to confidence, and comfort. He heals their diseases, restores their strength and vigour, and even removes those troubles which they have brought upon themselves by their own folly. He preserves them through the storms of temptation and persecution: he speaks peace, and commands a calm to their souls, when they are ready to give up all for lost. Whilst they are steering to the haven where they would be, they will be praising the Lord for his goodness, celebrating his wonderful works for them, sacrificing the sacrifices of thanksgiving, declaring his works with gladness, and exalting him in the congregation of his people. At length their souls will arrive at their expected rest; and at the appointed season, the brazen gates and iron bars of death will be burst by the power of their redeeming God: but who can describe their joy and gratitude, when "mortality shall thus be swallowed up of life!" Let us also remember to praise our God, for turning the wilderness, that we Gentiles inhabited, into a fruitful land, and opening for us the wells of salvation. Let us pray that the Jewish nation, which has been so long a barren desert, may again be watered with his grace, and bring forth the fruits of faith and holiness. Let all the Lord's ministers and people cultivate their fields and vineyards, their own souls, and those of their families and congregations; that, being blessed exceedingly, the church may yield more abundantly "the fruits of increase." Let us pray for the revival of religion in those places where the church is minished and brought low through oppression, or corrupted with superstition and error: and that God would convert, or pour contempt upon, all those princes or people who oppose the spread of his pure Gospel, that they may lose their labour, and be baffled in all their devices; and that he would replenish the poor in spirit and afflicted, and increase every one of his people into families, like large flocks of sheep. Then shall the righteous behold and rejoice, and iniquity shall be disgraced and repressed; and the wise observer will more and more understand and admire the loving-kindness of the Lord.

NOTES.

PSALM CVIII. V. 1. (Notes, lvii. 7—11.) This psalm consists of the latter part of the fifty-seventh psalm, and the latter part of the sixtieth, with no material alteration. The fifty-seventh was composed when David fled from Saul in the cave: and begins with grievous complaints, which are here omitted. The sixtieth was written after David had for some time reigned over all Israel, and when he was engaged in war with the Syrians and others. It also begins with complaints of the calamities to which Israel had been exposed; and these too are left out. So that this as a psalm is more in the strain of confidence, gratitude, and joyful hope, than either of those from which it is taken; and so, more suited to a season of thanksgiving for past mercies, and prayer for further deliverance: and it is probable it was compiled for that purpose. Even with my glory. 'My tongue, because it chiefly setteth forth the glory of God.'

V. 4. 'My thankfulness should be as boundless as thy mercy, which infinitely transcends all my expressions, and hath nothing equal to it, but thy faithfulness and truth.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 5. 'Let all the world see thy judgments, in that thou art God over all, and so confess that thou art glorious.'

V. 6. (Notes, lx. 5—12.) 'By thy mighty power accompany my arms, that I may be an instrument of delivering thy beloved people from their oppressors.' (Bp. Patrick.) The word beloved is plural.

V. 7. 'As he hath spoken to Samuel concerning me, so he will show himself constant and holy in his promise; so that these nations following shall be subject to me.' Nathan also had just before delivered a very encouraging message from God to David. (2 Sam. vii.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We may with great utility select passages from different psalms, to assist our devotions, encourage our expectations, or enliven our gratitude, in our private concerns, or in those of the church and nation. When the heart is established in faith and love, the tongue being employed in grateful praises will be indeed our glory: and every endowment will become honourable and profitable to the possessor, in proportion as it is employed in the service and to the glory of God. They who can sincerely use the Psalmist's language of adoring praise, may pray with assured faith and hope for all the blessings of salvation; which are secured to them by the faithful promise and covenant of God, and will be effected by his powerful arm, and communicated from his everlasting love and mercy. Let them then expect from him help in every trouble, and victory in every conflict; till Satan and every enemy be bruised under their feet. O Lord, visit all our souls with this salvation, even with this favour which thou bearest to thy chosen people!

NOTES.

PSALM CIX. V. 1. Most expositors suppose that David composed this psalm, when persecuted by Saul, who was rendered more implacable by the base and malicious calumnies of Doeg and others: but some expressions favour the opinion that it was written when David fled from Absalom, and that Ahithophel, rather than Doeg, is the person principally referred to. "The God of my 'praise;' 'whom I am accustomed to praise, and whom 'I take delight in praising.'"

V. 2—4. David was most basely deceived by Absalom, whose insinuations tended to depreciate his character: and the cursings and revilings of Shimei, who charged him to his face with being the murderer of Saul and his family, were, no doubt, the echo of calumnies circulated against him among some of his subjects; whilst other slanders, as malicious and groundless, would be better calculated for different descriptions of men. Thus the minds of the people were alienated from their aged king; and they readily joined Absalom in levying war against him, without a cause, or gratuitously, when he had done nothing to deserve it, but entirely the contrary. His indulgent affection for Absalom was excessive: He had preferred and honoured Ahithophel, as his counsellor and friend: and he had spent his life in promoting the benefit of his people; and in pouring out his prayers for them: yet he was thus ungratefully used by all parties. David was very useful to Saul, and to Israel in general; and to some of those in particular, that joined in persecuting him: but he had never shown that affection for Saul, or that friendship to Doeg, which he had for Absalom and Ahithophel. In all these respects, however, he was only a type of Christ, the history of whose life and death is the best comment on the passage.

V. 6—20. Whether David, when he wrote these verses, thought of Doeg, or Ahithophel, who (being a traitor,) more resembled Judas, as he also did in murdering himself, they are most certainly a prophetic denunciation of the doom which awaited the enemies of Christ, and Judas in particular: for the apostle has quoted one clause from the passage, with this remarkable introduction; "This Scripture must needs have been fulfilled, which the Holy Ghost, by the mouth of David, spake concerning Judas," &c. (8.) (Acts i. 16—20.) And the historian gives the exact words from the Septuagint, which translates the whole as an imprecation. Indeed the first verb is the only one which necessarily requires this construction, being literally rendered, "Set thou," &c. whereas all the other verbs may well be rendered in the future, as prophecies. Yet the first verb, being imperative, with the quotation in the Acts from the Septuagint, seems to imply, that sentence was prophetically denounced against the criminal or criminals, and not merely the event foretold. If David intended not only to predict, but to imprecate, the vengeance of God on apostate Ahithophel and his impenitent foes, as the first word seems to imply: it should be remembered, that "the Spirit of God spake by him;" taking occasion from his circumstances to predict in this alarming manner the miseries which would come on the enemies of the Messiah. But, unless we were under the same influence, the example is not suited for our imitation: and we ought by no means to adopt the words with reference to our own enemies; yet there can be no impropriety in reading or singing the psalm, as the sentence of our Judge on his implacable opposers and blasphemers, for a solemn warning to all who hear it; any more than in reading the latter part of the twenty-fifth chapter of St. Matthew, or the curses contained in the twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth chapters of Deuteronomy. We may apply the whole passage to Judas, who ungratefully and basely sold Jesus to his enemies. He was left to become the servant to a most wicked and cruel master, when he hired himself to Caiaphas as the head of the Sanhedrim, who treated his remorse of conscience with such contempt as helped to hurry him into desperation: his tempter "Satan stood at his right hand" as his accuser, and urged him to suicide: he hath ever since been considered as a guilty wretch by almost every body: he was expressly condemned by the Lord Jesus himself: his prayers were mere form and hypocrisy, and not the language of true repentance and faith, so that they aggravated his guilt: his days were few, and another was chosen to succeed to his apostleship. Probably he left a widow and fatherless children, on whom infamy and distress were entailed, in the righteous providence of God, till the family was extinct; and thus the sins of his progenitors were visited upon him and his descendants, in a remarkable manner. By betraying Christ, he refused his blessing, and avowed that he would not follow him in doing good; and preferred a curse and mischief, and as it were clothed himself with malevolence and treachery: the blessing of God would therefore be removed far from him; and his curse would cover and cleave to him as a garment, confine him as a girdle, enter into his bowels as water, and insinuate into his bones as oil; that is, it would be his only and his everlasting portion. The verses may also be applied to the Jewish nation; who having rejected and crucified Christ, were given up to be tyrannized over by one usurper after another, and to be infatuated by Satan in an unheard of manner. Under the divine condemnation for their obstinate unbelief, their hypocritical religion only added to their guilt, by rendering them more proud, bigoted, and furious in persecution of the Christians. Their civil and ecclesiastical state expired within forty years from the death of Christ, and their peculiar privileges were transferred to the Gentile converts. At the destruction of Jerusalem immense multitudes were slain; their widows and orphans were left to penury and misery; and their posterity have ever since been dispersed as vagabonds, and preyed upon by extortion and oppression, in almost every land: their name hath been, as it were, expunged from the records of the church: all the iniquities of the nation, from its origin, were visited on that and the succeeding generations; and the horrible imprecation, which the enraged persecutors of Christ uttered against themselves and their children, has been as awfully fulfilled. (Notes, Deut. xxviii. xxix.) The whole may also be applied to all the enemies of Christ and his church, in every age and nation. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 22-24. (16.) David, when driven from his palace and city, and out of Judah; and when compelled to depend on a few loyal subjects for sustenance, was at least as poor as during his persecutions by Saul: and his heart was far more deeply "wounded within him," both in contrition and self-abasement, and by anguish of spirit. Being advanced in years, he considered himself, as "a shadow that declineth," towards the sun-set; and not having a settled home, but wandering from place to place, according to the tidings brought him of the conspirators, he resembled the locust, which is driven by the wind to east or west, without being able to keep any settled course. And besides fasting, in humbling himself before God, and through sorrow of heart, he wanted often suitable provision; and thus he grew feeble and emaciated. But the poverty and sorrow of the Saviour, "who had not where to lay his head;" and all the events of his life, especially from his fasting in the wilderness, to the close of his sufferings on the cross, are most emphatically described.

V. 25. "I was also a reproach to them! They looked on me! they shook their heads." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 27. When God restored David to the throne in peace and honour, his hand was manifest in the surprising change, and his enemies were appalled and silenced: and when Christ was raised from the grave, and exalted to the right hand of the majesty in the heavens, the power of God was displayed to the conviction of millions in that and future ages, that the whole was his work.

V. 28-30. "They will curse, but thou wilt bless. They shall be ashamed: but thy servant shall rejoice. Mine adversaries shall be clothed with shame. They shall cover themselves with their own confusion as with a mantle. I will greatly, &c." The whole is future in the original. And the language of assured hope, or of clear foreknowledge, in the depth of distress, is more suited to the case, both of the type and antitype, as well as more animated, than that of supplication.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Our incarnate Redeemer willingly became poor, and submitted to pain and suffering, for our sakes, to atone for our sins and effect our salvation: and when we consider, that the gifts, which his hands bestow, were purchased by "his heart being wounded within him," by his "being wasted as a shadow, and driven about as a locust in the wind; and by his knees being weak with fastings:" we should place the higher value on them, and express the more gratitude to him. Those wicked men who spread slanders and uttered blasphemies against him; who compassed him about with words of hatred, and fought against him without a cause; who were his adversaries because of his love to sinners, and rewarded him evil for good; did indeed fulfil the predictions of the Scriptures and the divine decrees: but as they were actuated by the most diabolical enmity to God and holiness, so they exposed themselves to the most awful vengeance. If then we in any measure bear the image and seek the honour of Christ, we must expect to be hated by persons of the same character, and must stand prepared to bear their malice, slanders, treachery, injustice, and ingratitude, with firmness, patience, and meekness, "considering him who endured the contradiction of sinners against himself," and "giving ourselves unto prayer." And if we duly estimate our obligations to the Redeemer, we shall not be reluctant to suffer for his sake and according to his will; whether he be pleased to prove us by poverty, sickness, persecution, or self-denying labours. In all our trials we should call upon the Lord, as "the God of our praise," in whom we glory, and whom we delight to worship: we should beg of him to deliver us for his own name's sake, and according to his abundant mercy; and that his hand may appear and be glorified. We need not regard the malicious imprecations of ungodly men: though they curse, he will bless those who trust in him, and they will rejoice when their enemies will be covered with confusion: for God will plead the cause of those that honour him by their animated praises; he will rebuke Satan, and every accuser, and "save them from those who would condemn their souls." But we must persevere in blessing those who curse us, and in endeavouring to overcome evil with good. Yet in the case of Judas, and the unbelieving Jews, the enemies of Christ and his people may read their own doom, if they continue impenitent. No language can express the miseries that are coming upon them, where there will be no remedy, no help, no mercy: for what are all the temporal afflictions, which can befall us or our descendants, compared with the everlasting wrath of God? Indeed enmity against Christ is likely to entail infamy and misery upon a man's family through successive generations: and they who show no mercy, to the poor, especially to his needy and broken-hearted people, but treat them with insult and cruelty, must expect no mercy from God. Nay, when men reject the salvation of Christ, their very prayers are numbered among their sins. Satan will be permitted to tempt, to tyrannize over, to accuse, and to torment them, and their condemnation and ruin will be inevitable and sudden. In rejecting Christ, they refuse the blessing, and it will be far from them; the curse of the broken law is eventually their choice, and their portion: all the blasphemous expressions which they employ against the truths and professors of the Gospel, and all the imprecations which they liberally bestow on those who offend or differ from them, will rebound upon themselves, and enhance their condemnation and misery. This will be the reward of all the adversaries of Christ, and of all who revile and hate his people. Let sinners then take warning, and flee for refuge to the great Redeemer: let those who have employed their tongues in cursing and profaneness, fear and tremble, lest their multiplied imprecations should come upon them: let all opposers of the Gospel be persuaded to cease from their ruinous attempts: and let all the Lord's poor and afflicted people rejoice in him, and praise his holy name.

NOTES.

PSALM CX. V. 1. 'David speaks of some person much greater than himself, whom he calls his Lord; so that it can be no other but the LORD CHRIST, of whom he here prophecies: not, as he is wont to do elsewhere with respect to himself, in the first place, as his type and figure, but in plain words, which can belong to none but Christ alone: for no other king can be said to sit at God's right hand; nor was there any priest after the order of Melchizedek, that could be a type of him.—The Jews have taken a deal of pains to wrest this psalm to another sense: yet they are so divided in their opinions about it, (speaking inconsistent things, like drunken men, as St. Chrysostom's words are, or rather, says he, like men in the dark, running against one another;) that from thence alone we may be satisfied they are in the wrong, and have their eyes blinded.' (Bp. Patrick.)—'We are here informed of JEHOVAH's eternal and unchangeable decree concerning the kingdom of the Messiah, its extension, power, and duration. That Messiah should, after his sufferings, be thus exalted, was determined in the divine counsel and covenant, before the world began.'—'O my Son Messiah—take now the throne prepared for thee from the foundation of the world.—Behold all power is given to thee! 'Enter upon thy mediatorial kingdom, and reign till every opposer shall have submitted unto thee, and sin and death have felt thy all-conquering arm.' (Horne.) This interpretation is established by multiplied quotations from the Psalms, in the New Testament, with the most express application of it to the kingdom of Christ. (Marg. Ref.)—David, speaking by the Holy Spirit, calls the promised Messiah, his Lord, though he was to descend from him, according to the flesh: not only because he should hereafter be far superior to him and all the kings of the earth; but because he then existed in glory, as the eternal Son of God.

V. 2. In the former verse the royal prophet reported the words of JEHOVAH to the Messiah: but here he addresses the Messiah as present. 'The eternal LORD, who hath thus decreed to honour thee, O most mighty Prince, will make Zion first of all to feel how powerful thy sceptre is; and thence extend thy empire over all the earth; where, I foretel thou wilt prevail over all infidelity, idolatry, superstition, and impiety, which will set themselves against thy authority.' (Bp. Patrick.) 'Go on, victorious Prince, plant the standard of the cross among the thickest ranks of the adversary; and in opposition to both Jew and Gentile, tumultuously raging against thee, erect and establish thy church throughout the world.' (Horne.) The Gospel, "preached with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven," is the rod, or sceptre of the Redeemer's strength or authority. This was sent forth from Zion by the apostles and evangelists, who were the instruments of setting up his kingdom; by which he hath ever since reigned over an innumerable multitude of subjects, in the midst of his most furious and inveterate enemies; namely, evil spirits and wicked men, who in vain attempt to subvert his throne, or deprive him of his subjects.

V. 3. "The people" of Christ are those given him by his Father, and gathered to him by the preachers of his word. "The day of his power," is the season of their conversion, when the corruptions of nature can no longer hold out against the prevailing influences of grace; when the heart, and will, and affections turn from the world to God, and they make, as the first disciples did, a free and voluntary offering of themselves, and all they have, to the Redeemer. Then, they appear "in the beauties of holiness," adorned with humility, faith, hope, and love, and all the graces of the Spirit.' (Horne.)—"More than the dew from the womb of the morning—is the dew of thy progeny." Thus some translate the last clause: but perhaps the word rendered thy youth, refers to the first publication of the Gospel, the early days of the glorified Redeemer's kingdom; when converts, numerous as the drops of dew, which, by a bold metaphor, are said to be produced from the womb of the morning, "gladly received the word," willingly yielded themselves to the Lord Jesus. The word rendered willing, is literally voluntary offerings: it seems to imply the most unreserved cheerfulness in presenting the oblation; like that which David expresses (1 Chr. xxix. 17:) and the scene exhibited on the day of Pentecost, and just afterwards, when the haughty and selfish crucifiers of Christ, in that day of his power, not only were made willing by divine grace to accept his salvation, but devoted their all, as a free-will offering to his service. (Notes, Acts ii. iv.)

V. 4. 'The oath of God was the great seal of heaven, to intimate the importance of the deed to which it was set, and "to show the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel." 'Oblation, intercession, and benediction, are the three branches of the sacerdotal office, which our great High Priest exerciseth for us.' (Horne.) —(Notes, Gen. xiv. 18. Heb. vii.) The Redeemer's kingdom is inseparably connected with the performance of his priestly office; to which he was appointed by an irrevocable engagement of the Father, and in which he abides from age to age. In virtue of his atonement and intercession, he employs all his power and authority for the benefit of his redeemed people. But it should be carefully noted, that the two offices, of king and priest, were incompatible, according to the Mosaic law, at least after the appointment of David and his family to the kingdom: and the Jews must have known, if they had not been blinded by prejudice, that a new order and constitution must take place at the coming of the Messiah, who was to be "a Priest upon his throne," a Priest, not after Aaron's order, which, as David's son, he could not be; but after the order of Melchizedek. It is observable that this is the only place in which Melchizedek is mentioned in the whole Scripture, except in the narrative by Moses, and by the apostle, in proving to the Hebrews that Jesus was the Messiah. The New Testament dispensation made no alteration, except in those things in which the Old Testament taught all that understood it and attended to it, to expect an alteration. (Notes, Gen. xiv. 18—20. Zech. vi. 12, 13. Heb. vii.) 'As Melchizedek, the figure of Christ, was both king and priest, so the effect cannot be accomplished in any king, save only Christ.'

V. 5, 6. By "the Lord, or My Lord, at thy right hand,"—the same person must undoubtedly be understood, who is mentioned in the first verse under the same title, as sitting at the right hand of JEHOVAH. And the Psalmist, who had hitherto addressed himself to Messiah,

The kings of the earth will endeavour to destroy his religion, and put an end to his kingdom: the Neros, the Domitians, the Dioclesians, the Maxentiuses, the Julians, shall stand up, and set themselves in array against him: but the Lamb shall overcome them, he shall judge and punish them," and strew the ground with their carcasses.' (Horne.) This will receive a more tremendous completion, when he shall destroy all anti-christian powers, and set up his kingdom throughout the earth; as it must evidently appear to him, who attentively compares the various prophetic scriptures referred to in the margin.

V. 7. 'He shall first humble himself to the meanest condition; not living in the state of a king here in this world, but of a way-faring man, who is content with such provision as he meets with. For which cause, after enduring many hardships, even death itself, he shall be highly exalted, &c.' (Bp. Patrick.) In his way to glory, he was to drink deep of the waters of affliction.' (Horne.) "Drinking of the brook," may, however, mean the refreshments with which the Saviour was supported in passing through his sufferings, and beginning his conquests by triumphing over Satan on the cross, and over death by his resurrection: for either the waters of comfort, or the waters of affliction, may be meant; yet the scriptures referred to in the margin seem to favour the exposition first given.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Our ascended Saviour is King of kings and Lord of lords: the decree hath been accomplished; the Mediator reigns in human nature over all worlds, and shall reign till death, the last enemy, is destroyed by him. His powerful Gospel hath reached our land, and we have heard it: and his kingdom is set up amidst opposing foes. But what are we? Has his Gospel been "the power of God unto our salvation?" Has his kingdom been set up in our hearts? Are we become his loyal subjects? Once we knew not our need of his salvation, and were not willing that he should reign over us: have we then experienced a day of his power? Have we been rendered willing to renounce every sin, to turn our backs upon an ensnaring world, to rely only on his merits and mercy, and to have him for our Prophet, Priest, and King? And do we desire to be adorned with the beauties of holiness? Vast multitudes through successive generations have experienced this change; to them the Saviour's sacrifice, intercession, and benediction belong; he is their merciful and faithful

High-Priest, and their King of righteousness and peace; their powerful Protector and Friend; and because he ever liveth, they shall live also with him for evermore. Yet, as he passed through sufferings in his way to glory, so must his people: and having drunk of the bitter waters of death, they too shall lift up their heads, be delivered from Satan, sin, and every foe, and be for ever happy in his presence. But the Saviour's power will be very dreadful to all who oppose, neglect, or pervert his gospel. Many persecuting tyrants have already felt the weight of his vengeance; many more will yet be made sensible of the madness of provoking his indignation; and his coming to establish his kingdom, and to judge the world, will be attended with the terror and ruin of every enemy. Let us then bow to the sceptre of his grace, and yield ourselves to be his subjects, with all we are and have, as a free will offering, to be employed for his glory, that we may love his appearing, as the accomplishment of all our desires and expectations.

NOTES.

PSALM CXI. V. 1. This psalm consists of as many short metres as there are letters in the Hebrew alphabet, and in their regular order; so that Hallelujah could not be a part of the first verse, as that word begins with the fifth letter of the alphabet. It should, therefore, in general be considered as a title to the psalms which begin with it; pointing out the scope to the reader, and calling on him to prepare his heart for praising God. The word rendered assembly, signifies a secret council or company. "Secretly" among the faithful, and in the congregation. (Liturgy.) "I will make my thankful acknowledgments to the LORD with all my heart and soul; and that, not only in the private society of those good men whom I am more intimately acquainted withal, but in the public congregation of all his people." (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 2, 3. The works of God, in Creation and Providence, are grand displays of his power and majesty; and all who take pleasure in meditation on the divine perfections will, as they have opportunity, bestow pains to understand his works: but especially the work of Redemption is "beauty and glory;" being the display of his everlasting righteousness, in harmony with his mercy, and truth, and wisdom in pardoning, justifying, and saving sinners.

V. 4. "He hath appointed a memorial for his wonderful works." It is probable that the passover was especially meant; though all the appointed feasts of Israel were memorials of the wonderful works of God for that nation. Our Redeemer appointed a memorial of his wonderful grace and compassion in dying for our salvation, when he instituted the Lord's supper, saying, 'Do this in remembrance of me.'

V. 5. Meat, Prey, or a Portion.—'God hath given to his people all that was necessary; and will still do so even for his covenant's sake; and in this sense the Hebrew word is taken. (Prov. xxx. 8. xxxi. 15.) He gave them food, even manna, which recalled God's other wonders to remembrance: whence it was ordered to be preserved in the ark. It was a figure of the eucharist, which truly is an eternal monument of divine love.' (Bossuet in Horne.) With the leave, however, of this learned Popish Prelate, I must observe, that as the manna was only a figure, so the eucharist is no more: manna prefigured, and the eucharist commemorates, Christ, "the Bread of Life, who came down from heaven," and died on the cross, that he might give life unto the world. (Notes, John vi. 27—53.)

V. 6—8. The power of the works by which the Lord put Israel in possession of Canaan, was displayed in judgments on his enemies, and in fulfilling his faithful promises to his people, according to those appointments or decrees which he had made sure and established for ever, and which in due time he most punctually accomplished. 'All his orders of this kind are in pursuance of his most righteous decrees.' (Bp. Patrick.) The word rendered commandments, seems in this connexion to mean, the purposes and revelations which God had made concerning Israel, which were performed when he put them in possession of Canaan: but these were only shadows of his purposes and promises to the true Israel, the church of the redeemed.

10 The ^r fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom : * a * good understanding have all they that † do his commandments : * his praise endureth for ever.

V. 9, 10. The Israelites were slaves in Egypt, but God sent redemption to them. "He gave Egypt for their ransom," and rescued them by his almighty arm : according to the covenant, which he had established with Abraham, and which could not be disannulled. Thus he displayed his holy name, and showed that, as his enemies had abundant cause to tremble at his power, so his people ought to "serve him with reverence and godly fear." And indeed this fear of the LORD is the beginning or principal part of true wisdom, and makes way for the attainment of all the rest. (Notes, Gen. xxii. 12. Job xxviii. 28.) 'Religion is the perfection of wisdom, practice the best instructor, and thanksgiving the sweetest recreation.' (Horne.) "A good understanding is to them who practise these things." "His praise endureth for ever." They who do these things will praise God for ever : or they will be honoured for ever. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Our exhortations should always be seconded by our example, if we would render them effectual. In worshipping God we should be careful to approve our hearts sincere before him, and to have our affections lively : at the same time, we should be avowed in our grateful praises, and present them in the select companies of upright believers, and in the great congregations which assemble for public worship : for this has a powerful tendency to make known his glory, and to animate and edify his people. At the first glance we perceive a majesty and greatness in all the works of God ; and there is nothing mean or trivial to be any where discovered in them. If we have any taste for sublimity, grandeur, and beauty, we shall take peculiar pleasure in investigating the works of creation and providence ; and in admiring the discoveries which are made of the divine wisdom, power, and goodness in every one of them, the minute as well as the immense. But without a relish for the spiritual excellency of true holiness, we shall not find satisfaction in looking into the greatest and most wonderful of all the works of God : nor shall we deduce a profitable conclusion from any of our investigations, or learn from them to love, trust, and serve the Lord with joy and gratitude ; and then how incapable must we be of the employment and happiness of heaven ! Indeed the administration of his universal kingdom is honourable ; "the ministration of condemnation is glorious : but the ministration of righteousness, exceeds in glory." This is the fullest display of all his harmonious attributes which JEHOVAH hath ever made : his everlasting righteousness here shines forth, connected with the exercise of boundless mercy ; and being "gracious, and full of compassion," he hath here "made his wonderful works to be had in remembrance." As the Israelites subsisted on the manna, so the great Redeemer has given his flesh for the life of the world ; and whilst he sustains our souls in so wonderful a manner, he will not starve our bodies, or our families. If the Lord, "being mindful of his covenant with Abraham," "showed his people the power of his works, that he might give them the heritage of the heathen ;" he will show his true people, who are interested in the covenant of grace, greater things, that he may put them in possession of their heavenly inheritance. The works of his hand are all wrought in performance of his promises, or in executing his threatenings ; and are done in verity and judgment. As his holy law is established on an immutable basis ; so all his commandments issued forth for the salvation of his people are sure, and stand fast for ever, being done in truth and uprightness. Having sent his people a redemption of a nobler nature than that of Israel out of Egypt ; he hath ratified his covenant with them for ever, by his irrevocable word. His name is holy and terrible ; and as sinners tremble before him, so saints should stand in awe of his infinite Majesty. The fear of him is the beginning of wisdom. No man is wise who doth not fear the Lord, and no man acts wisely except as he is influenced by that fear : this will always lead us to repentance, to faith in Christ, and to watchful and conscientious obedience. Such persons are of a good understanding, however poor, unlearned, or despised they may be in the world : and as God will be praised and glorified in and by them for ever ; so will they be honoured of him, and commended for their wisdom by their fellow-servants for ever and ever.

NOTES.

PSALM CXII. V. 1. This psalm is composed in the same manner as the foregoing : and, it should be remarked, that the Septuagint places the word Hallelujah as the title to this and similar psalms. "It seems intended as a short commentary upon the last verse of the preceding psalm." The wise man is happy : "the fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom." Where the true fear of God possesses the heart, the happy man will love God's commandments, greatly delight in obeying them, and only grieve that he "cannot do the things that he would."

V. 2, 3. It is probable that Lot thought of enriching his family, when he chose the fertile plains of wicked Sodom: “but Abraham” feared the LORD “and delighted greatly in his commandments;” and his descendants were “mighty on earth:” and thus it will generally be in every age with the posterity of those who imitate the father of the faithful.

V. 4. The upright believer is a follower, or imitator, of his God, especially in kindness and compassion and equity. He may and will have distress or affliction; but light, or comfort, will arise in the midst of it.

V. 5. (Marg. Ref.) ‘He gives to one and lends to another, as occasion serves: and yet orders all his affairs so judiciously, that he doth not impair, but rather maintains, the good estate of his family.’ (Bp. Patrick.) This sentiment, which our translation establishes, is very beautiful and scriptural: yet the original words do not obviously convey it; but rather, that the upright man conducts all his concerns with equity. He is first just, then liberal. Each of the interpretations conveys its appropriate instruction. ‘He who employeth his talents for the good of mankind, will be able to render a good account to his Lord who intrusteth them with him.’ (Horne.)

V. 6. The man of whom the Psalmist spake, possessed the “things which accompany salvation,” and would therefore most surely be “kept by the power of God through faith,” to the eternal enjoyment of it. (Note, Heb. vi. 9, 10.) ‘When his work is done, his body will go to its repose in the dust; but the memorial of his name and good deeds will be still fresh as the morning breeze, and fragrant as the flower.’ (Horne.) It is, however, in heaven alone, that all persons of this character will be remembered, and that for ever.

V. 7. Dismaying fear of outward calamities, or even of death and judgment, arises either from entire unbelief, or from weakness of faith and want of assured hope: and these are commonly the effect of a comparatively negligent and unfruitful conduct: but the character here described is strong in faith and hope, and very diligent and fruitful; and thus exempt from those terrors which distress others.

V. 10. The word rendered grieved is literally enraged:

and it may be easily conceived, how persecutors especially will be filled with rage and madness, when they witness the final triumph, and exalted honour, and complete felicity, of the very persons whom they most implacably hate.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The blessed Redeemer so delighted in the commandments of the Lord, that it was his meat to obey them perfectly, in the midst of temptation and sufferings. His true disciples whom he owns as brethren, share his unsearchable riches, and his everlasting righteousness; and being blessed in him, according to the degree of their faith and grace, they bear his image, and tread in his steps. They are taught to fear the Lord, as well as to love and praise him; and they delight greatly in the law of God; though not able perfectly to obey it. Blessings are laid up for them and their posterity; and as much of this world’s possessions as can be profitable to them. In their darkest hours the light of hope and peace springs up within them, and seasonable relief turns their mourning into joy. From their Lord’s example they learn to be gracious and full of compassion, as well as just in all their dealings: they show favour, and give or lend to the poor and needy, as occasion requires and ability is afforded; and they are instructed to employ frugality and discretion in their affairs, as means of being enabled to liberality. But as they should not dissipate their substance in needless expense, nor bury their talent in a napkin; so they ought not to give it away at random; but to disperse their bounty, (as the husbandman does his seed,) in that measure and manner which is likely to produce the most good to mankind. But, alas! it must be owned that only some, nay, but few of those, who contend zealously for the doctrines of the Gospel, exhibit such a character as is here drawn; especially in imitating the Saviour’s compassionate, self-denying, liberal love: and it is worthy of inquiry, whether the fears, and doubts and complaints, of which we hear more than of the voice of joy and praise, and the language of unshaken confidence in God amidst dangers and alarms, do not arise from this source. The Lord deals with them as they do with the poor;

he metes to them in their own measure; and no wonder they have but little comfort, who do so little to make their brethren comfortable; and but little confidence, who are so deficient in the scriptural evidences of conversion. (Notes, Is. lviii.) But they who show their faith by their works, in the way and degree here described, most certainly have a "righteousness which endureth for ever," and they shall never be separated from the love of God their Saviour. Envy and detraction may for a time hide their true characters; but "they shall be had in everlasting remembrance." They need not and ought not to be afraid of evil tidings: and by steadfastly trusting in the Lord, they rise above terror when they hear of wars, pestilences, earthquakes, or famines; and even at the approach of death, and in the day of judgment, they shall have confidence. Then they will behold their enemies confounded and condemned: the fruits and evidences of their faith and love will be produced before men and angels, and their horn shall be exalted with eternal honour. But their felicity will increase the torment of the wicked, who shall gnash with their teeth and consume away; whilst all their desires and expectations close in eternal disappointment and despair. Lord, form us by thy grace to the character, that we may possess the felicity, of thy redeemed people!

NOTES.

PSALM CXIII. V. 1. We are informed by the Jewish writers, that this and the five following psalms were sung at their feasts, especially after the Passover. 'By this often repetition, he stirreth up our cold dulness to praise God.'

V. 3. 'If God's glory shine through all the world, and therefore of all ought to be praised; what great condemnation were it to his people, among whom it chiefly shineth, if they should not earnestly extol his name.'

V. 7, 8. The advancement of Joseph, David, and others, from a low condition to the highest authority, seems alluded to. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9. This verse may thus be rendered, perhaps more literally, "He maketh her who was barren in the family, to sit as a joyful mother of sons." The instances of Sarah, Rebekah, Rachel, the mother of Samson, Hannah, the woman of Shunem, and Elizabeth, who were long barren, but were at length made joyful mothers, by the special blessing of God, are supposed to have been emblems of the calling of the Gentiles: when that vast proportion of the earth, which had so long been barren, produced multitudes of true converts, the sons and daughters of the church, and of the Lord Almighty who hath espoused her unto himself. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The redeemed servants of the Lord may well sing his praises, when employed in his pleasant service, and enjoying the comfort of his presence and favour. His name shall be blessed from age to age, to the end of time and to eternity: and he will be praised from the rising of the sun to the going down of the same. His unequalled and infinite majesty becomes the more glorious by his unspeakable condescension. He is not only high above all nations, but his glory is above the very heavens in which he dwelleth. He humbleth himself in noticing the concerns, and in accepting the exalted adorations, of angels and archangels! How vast then must be his condescension, in attending to the interests, and in regarding the worship of us mean polluted sinners on earth! How inconceivable his love in assuming our nature, and tabernacling among us, that he might ransom our guilty souls! In his providence, the Lord sometimes raises men from the most abject to the most honourable stations in society; and it is well when they acquit themselves properly in their new dignities. But this is his constant method in his kingdom of grace. He takes us beggars, debtors, nay, rebels and traitors, from the dust, the dunghill, or the dungeon, to be his favourites, his children, to be kings and priests unto him; and thus he numbers us with the princes of his chosen people. He giveth us all our comforts; which are generally the more welcome when they have been long delayed, and were no longer expected. Nor should the hint be overlooked, that joyful mothers should cheerfully bear the confinement of tending on their beloved children. But whilst we bless the Lord for favouring the Gentile world with the joy of his salvation; let us pray, that those lands, which are yet barren, may, by the genial influence of his Gospel, become fruitful, and produce numerous converts, who may join with us in praising the Lord for ever.

NOTES.

PSALM CXIV. V. 1, 2. When God brought Israel out of Egypt, he manifested his presence among them, as his sanctuary in which he had chosen to reside; and he exercised dominion over them in the most open and explicit manner, giving laws, inflicting punishments on the refractory, and protecting his loyal subjects against all their enemies. The Psalmist wrote as one full of his subject; and therefore he did not name that glorious God whose wonderful works he celebrated; supposing that all would certainly know his meaning and enter into his feelings.

V. 3—6. Few passages can any-where be found, and probably none except in the oracles of God, which unite so much sublimity and simplicity, as these verses do. They are inexpressibly beautiful, and in the highest style of poetry: and need attention more than explanation.—The fifth verse is literally—‘What was it to thee, O sea, that thou fleddest?’ &c.—‘The waters are poetically represented as sensible of their Creator’s presence.’ (Horne.) The deliverance of Israel, and the visible effects of Omnipotence attending it, may be considered as a figure of the establishment of Christianity, and the fall of opposing powers before it; for which no adequate cause can be assigned, except “that it was of God, and men could not overturn it.”

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When the Lord comes for the salvation of his chosen people, he redeems them from the power of sin and Satan, and separates them from an ungodly world, and its maxims, customs, and language: he forms them to be his temple, and he becomes their King. From that time he has engaged to make them his peculiar care; he meets them in his ordinances; and causes the whole course of nature, and all the dispensations of his providence, to concur in doing them good. Having, as it were divided the Red Sea, to bring them out of bondage, at their conversion; he will surely divide Jordan, to open them a safe passage to their heavenly inheritance. All things, even death itself, are theirs; and all nature shall sooner change its settled course, than one of his promises shall fail. As the Son of God, the Rock of ages, gave himself to death, to open a fountain to wash away their sins, and to supply them with the waters of life and consolation: whilst they are washing in that fountain and drinking of those waters, they cannot possibly think any thing too great to expect from his unfathomable love. But if the inanimate creation is represented as trembling at the presence of the Creator, how should sinners fear before their just and holy Governor and Judge! His voice from mount Sinai may well alarm those who have broken that holy law, and yet remain under the curse of it: and they who neglect the great salvation of the Gospel, are liable to another and more terrible condemnation: but none will be so dreadfully punished as they will who injure the Lord’s chosen people, and try to obstruct them in their pilgrimage. What will be their consternation, when the Judge shall appear, and all creation shall melt at his presence! Let us now prepare to meet our God, that we may not be terrified or ashamed, but have confidence before him at his coming.

NOTES.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

As we are unworthy of all our blessings, so none of the glory of them belongs to us, but the whole must be rendered to the Lord, who hath glorified all his perfections, and especially his mercy and truth, in the salvation of his people; in pardoning, sanctifying, upholding, and comforting them from day to day; and in supplying all their wants, both temporal and spiritual. In like manner, when our conscious unworthiness is ready to extinguish our hopes, we have a never-failing plea, in the same important truths: and we may entreat the Lord to save and bless us, for the glory of his mercy and truth, in Jesus Christ, when all our other arguments are silenced. For it can never consist with his honour, that his avowed enemies should finally triumph over those who profess his truth and call upon his name; and thus be emboldened in impiety and infidelity. Our God is upon his glorious throne, and "doeth as he pleaseth" in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of "the earth:" and the temporary success of his enemies, and troubles of his people, will assuredly end in the greater good of the latter and the deeper confusion of the former. Whilst we reflect upon the stupidity of idolaters with indignation and contempt, let us humbly recollect that we are the same by nature, and remember to give God the glory of making us to differ. They who reject the Gospel, to rely for salvation on themselves, and they who idolize worldly advantages, which cannot profit them in the hour of death, or in the day of judgment, are as fatally deceived as even the worshippers of idols. But we are called Christians, and some of us sustain the office of ministers; (being the spiritual Israel, and the house of Aaron;) let us then remember to act consistently with our character and profession; let us not "lean to our own understanding," depend on our own righteousness and strength, trust in our own hearts, or rely on uncertain riches and the friendship

'own; they ground their prayers upon this promise.'—The verses are evidently a prayer for deliverance; though often quoted as a thanksgiving for benefits received, and they may properly be thus applied. God was entreated to help his people; not because they deserved it, or that they might be honoured, but that his name might be glorified, and the blasphemies of his enemies silenced, by the performance of his faithful and merciful engagements to his worshippers. Perhaps the psalm was written during Sennacherib's invasion of Judah.

V. 3-7. 'A beautiful contrast is here formed between the God of Israel and the heathen idols. He made every thing: they are themselves made by men: He doeth whatsoever he pleaseth; they can do nothing. He seeth the distresses, heareth the prayers, accepteth the offerings, cometh to the assistance, and effecteth the salvation of his servants: they are blind, deaf, dumb, senseless, motionless, and impotent.' (Horne.)

V. 8. The makers and worshippers of idols renounce their reason and understanding, and willingly become as stupid as the objects of their worship: "Having eyes they see not, having ears they hear not," &c. (Isaiah xlv. 9-20.)

V. 9-13. The Israelites in general, and the priests in particular, (who were required to teach the people by example, as well as precept,) were exhorted to trust in the Lord; reminded how he had in all ages shown himself the Helper of such as thus relied on him; and assured that he would bless them. The proselytes, also from other nations, seem intended by those "who fear the LORD."

V. 14. The increase of the church, by the conversion of the Gentiles, as well as the prosperity of Israel, is here predicted.—(Marg. Ref.) There is a peculiar animation in the concluding part of the psalm, when considered, not as praise for benefits obtained, but as the language of faith and hope in urgent difficulties.

PSALM CXVI.

The Psalmist avows his gratitude to God, who had answered his prayers, and brought him out of deep distress; and resolves to worship and serve him all his days, 1—9. He records his temptation to unbelief, and his victory over it, 10, 11. He determines to perform his vows, and render thanks to God after the most public manner at the sanctuary, 12—19.

of the world: but let us trust in the Lord alone, for acceptance, assistance, sustenance, protection, comfort, usefulness, and everlasting happiness. "He hath ever been mindful of his servants, and will bless them; even every one of them who fear him, both small and great." He will increase the number of his true ministers and people, and prosper them and their children; for they are indeed "the blessed of the Lord who made heaven and earth." The heaven, which belongs to him, he reserves as the peculiar inheritance of his children; the earth he hath given indiscriminately to the children of men: and wretched will they be who have no better portion; for indeed they are but stewards, who will shortly be called to give an account of their stewardship. But grace is our own, and will never be taken from us. As to the rest, a little will bear the expenses of our pilgrimage: let us then be content, and thankful for our allowance, and moderate in the use of it. Let us communicate of our little to those that have less: and, if any have much intrusted to them, let them prove their interest in the true riches, by faithfully improving the mammon of unrighteousness. As death will terminate our opportunities of praising God on earth, let us now redeem the time, that we may glorify him with our lips and in our lives. Then we shall shortly join the company before the throne, and assist them in blessing our God; and our bodies will be raised from the silent grave, to join in this delightful work to all eternity: whilst successive generations shall be occupied on earth, in celebrating the praises of our God, till time shall be no more.

NOTES.

PSALM CXVI. V. 1. Various are the opinions of learned men concerning the author of this psalm, and the time when it was composed. But perhaps David wrote it; not when persecuted by Saul, (for the sanctuary was not then at Jerusalem) but either when delivered from Absalom's rebellion, or after some other sharp trial, between the removal of the ark to Zion, and that event.—The original of this verse is, "I love; because the LORD hath, &c." atitude is not mentioned at first, but may be collected from what follows. The abrupt opening was expressive of a full heart. Some render the clause, I am satisfied, or I am well pleased: but it seems rather more in the manner of Peter's earnest declaration, "Lord, thou knowest all things, thou knowest that I love thee."

V. 2. "In so readily granting my desires, he encourages and engages me—to the last breath of my life to expect deliverance from him." (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 3. It is likely that the inward anguish of the Psalmist's mind was equal to his outward sufferings. He seemed to feel at once the agonies of death, and that sense of wrath and remorse of conscience which have in them something of the pains of hell. (Marg. Ref.) It is by no means natural to interpret both the expressions of the fear or pain of death, or of death, and the grave in which no pains are felt; when so obvious an interpretation offers itself, and so suited to the feelings of every one who in great pain of body and remorse of conscience, has been alarmed with the dread of immediate death.

V. 4. The expressive brevity of the prayer here mentioned is well worth noticing.

V. 5. "A just God and a Saviour;" righteous in showing mercy to the guilty, as well as faithful to his promises.

V. 6. The simple are they who feel themselves liable to be imposed on by designing foes: are destitute of wisdom and power to deliver themselves; but renounce all other dependence, to rely wholly on God, and in simplicity and godly sincerity wait on him to save them.

V. 7. To know, trust, love, and delight in God, is the rest of rational creatures. This is forsaken through sin; and hence arises the restlessness of mankind: but the believer has returned to God through the Saviour, and found, in some measure, "a rest to his soul, which is the earnest and foretaste of heavenly felicity." Yet this is imperfect, and often interrupted, especially by sin: and when chastenings bring the wanderer from God to a due sense of his sin and folly, conscious guilt at first often increases the agitation of his mind: till recollection of the Lord's former kindness, and the consolations he vouchsafed, and the hope of recovering them, encourage and allure him to return by repentance, faith, and prayer; and this purpose is strengthened by every token and taste of returning peace and comfort. This seems to have been the Psalmist's experience.

V. 8, 9. Rescued by special grace from death and ruin, comforted from distressing sorrow, and recovered and upheld, after grievous falls, the Psalmist determined to walk as in the sight of God in the 'land of the living.' The original word is plural, lands: so that the promised land cannot exclusively be intended; but rather the Psalmist meant to say, that he would walk before God while he lived here; and expected at last to enjoy his presence in heaven, and serve him for ever and ever.

V. 10, 11. "I believed, and therefore spoke," that is, 'I called on God under my distresses,' in expectation of help from him alone. But 'I was so discouraged and afflicted, that in the hurry of my mind, I could place no reliance on any man, but thought even those deceivers in whom before I had the greatest confidence.' Some expositors, supposing that David wrote the psalm during the life of Saul, or very soon after his death, conclude that he referred to Samuel especially, who had anointed him to the kingdom, as if he had deceived him with vain hopes. Or, if a later date be assigned, it may be thought that he intended Nathan, by whom he had been assured that Solomon should succeed him. He may, however, most naturally be supposed to refer to Abithophel's treachery, Absalom's rebellion, and the revolt of Israel; which so astonished and afflicted him, that he was ready to suspect every one about him; though the event proved that he had many faithful zealous friends. His faith in God's mercy and truth, amidst his fears and suspicions concerning men, remained unshaken, and gained the victory.

V. 12. Some render this verse thus: "What shall I render unto the LORD? All his benefits overcome me!" 'I am so overwhelmed with his abundant goodness, that I am lost in wonder, and know not how to express my gratitude.'

V. 13. 'I will call all my friends together to rejoice with me; and taking the cup, which we call the cup of deliverance, (because when blessed and set apart, we are went to commemorate the blessings we have received,) 'I will magnify the power, goodness, and faithfulness of God my Saviour before all the company; and then give it to them, that they may praise his name together with me.' (Bp. Patrick.) It seems to have been customary among the Jews thus to take the cup of deliverances, when celebrating their solemn feasts, as well as when offering sacrifices of thanksgivings for peculiar mercies: and it is thought that our Saviour, when complying with this custom at his last passover, thence took occasion to institute the Lord's supper; which hath ever since been to Christians the cup of Salvation, and a memorial of his immeasurable love, in giving himself to death for their sins; and a grateful acknowledgment of the inestimable benefits they receive through his atoning sacrifice. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 15. The Lord accounts the death of his saints a very important event. He will not allow their enemies to cut them off before his appointed time. The circumstances of their death are regulated by infinite wisdom and love, for their final benefit: that solemn event often proves a precious opportunity to the survivors, and tends greatly to the honour of God: and it always issues in their complete felicity. The word rendered saints, may either mean those who obtain mercy from God, or such as have been taught by him to show mercy. Our Lord seems to have had it in view, when he said, "Blessed are the merciful; for they shall obtain mercy."

V. 16. "I confess before thee, that I am thy servant, &c. Thou hast loosed my bonds." 'The recent deliverance which I have experienced, lays me under new, and stronger obligations than ever, to serve thee, with all the power and influence which I possess, and I thus avow my purpose of so doing.' (Note, lxxxvi. 16.)

V. 17-19. "Calling on the name of the LORD," sometimes means, celebrating his praises, and acknowledging his mercies, as well as prayer and supplication. The Psalmist, when calling on God for deliverance during his distress, had solemnly vowed to make the most public acknowledgments of his goodness, when his prayer should be answered. And now he brought his thank-offerings to the sanctuary, and there in the presence of all Israel blessed and praised the Lord: calling on all the congregation to join him in this reasonable service.

PSALM CXVII.

*A prophetic call to all nations to praise
God for his mercy and truth, 1, 2.*

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

We should not only be satisfied and delighted, when “the LORD hath heard our voice and our supplications;” but should love him on that account, as well as for his own essential excellencies and all his innumerable benefits. But we are never so greatly affected with his condescension and kindness, as when he hath relieved us out of extreme distress. The poor sinner, when awakened to a sense of his state and character, recollects that he must shortly die, and fears lest he should sink under the righteous and everlasting wrath of God; then “the sorrows of death and the pains of hell get hold of him, and he finds trouble and sorrow.” But let such persons, without delay, call upon the Lord, and say, “O LORD, I beseech thee, deliver my soul:” and they will find him most gracious, and true to his promise, and will learn how his perfect justice coincides with his abounding mercy: for he is as ready to teach the simple, and uphold the feeble, and defend the poor who trust in him, as he is to pardon the guilty, and sanctify the unholy: and having raised them up from this low estate, they will learn to love him and call upon him as long as they live. His ways are not as ours are: he pardons criminals, and relieves the indigent, that they may be encouraged to come again and again, and may learn to love prayer; because “he delights in the prayer of the upright.” Let then those “who labour, and are heavy laden, come to him, that they may find rest to their souls;” (Matt. xi. 28—30.) Let believers keep close to their rest; and if they be at all drawn from it, let them make haste to return, remembering how “bountifully the LORD hath dealt with them.” Having “delivered our souls from death, our eyes from tears, and our feet from falling,” we should deem ourselves bound “to walk before him,” and as in his presence. But when we shall enter our heavenly rest, our deliverance from sin and sorrow will be complete; our tears will be finally wiped away, and our feet will no more slip; but we shall behold the glory, and walk in the presence of God, in the land of the living, with inconceivable delight.

V. 10—19.

When we are discomposed by temptations: we had in general better keep silence if possible, for we are apt to speak very unadvisedly: and our conviction of man’s deceitfulness may sometimes lead us, before we are aware, to impeach the divine veracity, and to treat even those as liars, who would encourage us from the promises of God’s word. But true faith will at length prevail in every conflict; and being humbled for our distrust of God’s word, we shall experience his faithfulness. What shall the redeemed sinner, when his heart is full of joy and gratitude;

O ^a Praise the LORD, all ye nations: ^b praise him, all ye people.
2 For his merciful kindness is great toward us: and the truth of the LORD endureth for ever. Praise ye the LORD.

or what shall any of us, who have been delivered from urgent trouble and distress, “render unto the LORD for “all his benefits towards us?” We cannot in any way profit him, or offer him any thing which he hath not first given unto us; and our best is unworthy of his acceptance: yet we ought to devote ourselves and all we have to his service and glory. Whilst we enjoy the comfort of his salvation in our secret communion with him, we should also make an open profession of our faith and love, and avow our dependence on him, and obligations to him, by taking the cup of salvation, and remembering the bleeding love of our divine Saviour, in that ordinance which he hath instituted for that purpose: thus joining ourselves to him and to his people, and with them calling upon his name, that we may be enabled by his grace to walk consistently with our profession. Thus every sinner, who hath found peace and deliverance through the blood of Christ, should pay his vows in the presence of all his people. Thus every true son of the church, whose bonds have been loosed, and who is become the servant of God, should frequently offer the sacrifice of thanksgiving, as well as join in other parts of his solemn worship. And every believer, when he hath received any recent mercy, should express his gratitude, by this memorial of that precious blood-shedding which hath purchased all our mercies; and should avow his purpose of devoting his future life to the service of the God of his salvation. Such are the true saints of God, in whose lives and deaths he will be glorified: no enemy or event can deduct from their appointed period on earth; much less shall any destroy their souls. But when the measure of their trials and services is accomplished, their God and Saviour will remove them, in the best manner, to that new Jerusalem, where they will pay their vows with all the redeemed, and offer eternal sacrifices of exalted praise and thanksgiving, “to him who loved them, and washed them from their sins in his own blood:” and their bodies also shall at length be raised incorruptible to join the sacred worship, and share that glorious felicity. Let us then “give diligence to make our calling and election sure;” let us trust the Lord in the path of duty: let us fear no danger, and decline no difficulty in his service: and let us learn to consider the day of our death as the period of our labours and conflicts, and our entrance into rest, into glory, and felicity.

NOTES.

PSALM CXVII. V. 1. ‘This psalm, like the hundred and tenth, seems to be altogether prophetic of the joy that all the world should conceive, at the coming of the Messiah to give salvation, first to the Jews, and then to all other nations, according to his faithful promise.—St. Paul applies the first words of it to this business; (Rom. xv. 11:) and some of the Hebrews justify the application.’ (Bp. Patrick.)

PSALM CXVIII.

The psalmist exhorts all orders of men in Israel to praise God, 1—4. He shows by his own experience how good it is to trust in the Lord, 5—18. In blessing him for deliverance and advancement, and calling on the people to join in his triumphant praises, he predicts the coming and the kingdom of the Messiah, 19—29.

V. 2. 'For the merciful kindness of the Lord towards us hath prevailed, (or has been confirmed to us;) and his truth for ever, Hallelujah.' (Notes, Rom. xv. 8—13.) God promised to Abraham, that in Christ his Seed all nations should be blessed: he confirmed that promise when he sent the Saviour, raised him from the dead, exalted him at his right hand, and called the Gentiles into the church: but a still more literal and extensive accomplishment of it will take place at the Millennium.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We are the very persons, whom the Holy Spirit here addresses, and calls to join our Hallelujahs with those of his ancient people: and "therefore we ought to give the more earnest heed to the things which we have heard." The very circumstance of our being the professed worshippers of the true God, by means of the Gospel of Christ, that "Seed of Abraham, in whom all nations shall be blessed;" is a sufficient demonstration that the Scriptures are divinely inspired; that the mercy of God hath prevailed; and that he is ever mindful of his promise, and faithful to it even to a thousand generations. But let us take care that none of us receive this gift of God in vain: let us seek the fulfilment to us, personally, of those promises which ensure the believer's eternal salvation: and, while we make it our business to glorify our God in word and deed, let us still pray, that all the nations of the earth may show forth his praises, for having called them out of darkness into the marvellous light of his blessed Gospel.

NOTES.

PSALM CXVIII. V. 1—4. David is thought to have composed this psalm, after his advancement to the throne, and his victories over his enemies round about; and probably it was sung by the priests, Levites, and congregation of Israel, with David at the head of them, as they marched up to the tabernacle to render public thanks for these benefits. 'David, rejected of Saul and the people, in the appointed time obtained the kingdom. Under his person in all this was Christ lively set forth.—Because God, by creating David king, showed his mercy towards his afflicted church; the prophet doth not only thank God himself, but exhorteth all the people to do the same.'

V. 5. 'We are here taught, that the more troubles oppress us, the more ought we to be instant in prayer.'—"The LORD heard," (or answered,) "me by enlargement." When the Israelites, being straitened by the Canaanites, were enabled to drive them away and possess their inheritance, the Lord heard them, (as he did Jabez;) and "enlarged their coast." David brought out of the cave, and made king over all Israel; Christ freed from the grave, and made Head over all things to his church; the slave of sin made free, and become the servant of God; and the believer "delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God;" are instances illustrative of the Psalmist's meaning, to which many others might be added.

V. 7. See, &c. The Septuagint renders this very properly, "I shall look on all mine enemies." 'I shall meet them with boldness, look them in the face without fear; and witness either their submission or destruction.'

V. 8, 9. Some render these verses, 'It is better for a man to betake himself to the LORD, than to trust in men, &c. even princes.' The unfaithfulness, changeableness, weakness, and mortal nature of men, however distinguished, render all confidence in them vain and insecure: and the Lord's jealousy for his own honour induces him to punish those who are guilty of this idolatrous confidence, and to encourage such as betake themselves to him in danger and distress.

V. 10—12. The nations bordering on Canaan confederated against David, and compassed him about, like swarms of bees, as if they would sting him to death. But, depending on the assistance of the Lord, he gained repeated victories over them; so that their rage terminated like the fire kindled amongst thorns; which is vehement, and makes a great blaze and noise, and consumes the thorns, and then is extinguished without much effect. Every victory David gained was an earnest of further success; and he trusted, that by the help of the Lord he should be able to destroy all his enemies. Thus the Redeemer, personally, and in his church, hath been opposed by all the nations of the earth; but destruction from the Lord is the inevitable consequence of persisting in that opposition, however numerous and formidable the opponents may appear. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 13. Perhaps Saul was meant, as that enemy who had thrust sore at David that he might fall. When Satan tempted Christ, and afterwards, when he prevailed to have him crucified, and assailed him with all his power in that hour of darkness; he thrust sore at the church, to destroy her at once in the person of her Representative. The believer has often occasion to use the words with a similar application.

V. 14. 'In that he was delivered, it came not of himself, or of the power of man, but only of God's favour: * therefore he will praise him.' (Note, Ex. xv. 2.) The name JAH, used in the text referred to, which is here exactly copied, occurs many times in this psalm.

V. 15, 16. David's deliverance from Saul, and his exaltation to the throne, were typical of Christ's resurrection and ascension: and on the Lord's day, when his resurrection is especially commemorated, the dwellings of true believers all over the earth resound with the voice of joyful and thankful praises; because "the right hand of the LORD hath done valiantly, and is exalted."

V. 17, 18. The triumph of David over his persecutors was an earnest of further mercies and continued protection; that he might "declare the works of the LORD." He had been sharply chastened and tried: but he "was not given over to death;" but preserved to be a highly honoured instrument of glorifying God and promoting Israel's prosperity. Christ, having suffered unknown agonies, when "the chastisement of our peace was upon him," was not given over unto death," but rose from the dead, and said to his servant John, "I am He that liveth and was dead; and behold I am alive for evermore; and have the keys of death and of hell." By his Gospel he declares the works of the LORD throughout the earth; and "because he liveth," all his true disciples "shall live also."

V. 19—24. David, preserved from death, triumphant over his enemies, and now going up to the temple to offer his thank-offerings, attended by the thousands of Israel, seems here to call upon the porters and other Levites, to open the gates of the sanctuary for his admission. These are called the gates of righteousness; because of the characters of those who offered acceptable worship, in the courts of God, and because of the nature of the services there performed. They who were within seem to have sung responsive, "This is the gate of the LORD, into which the righteous shall enter:" and then the whole company, perhaps in parts, sang the following verses.—David's advancement to the throne, notwithstanding the opposition which had long been made to it, was referred to: but the whole passage is evidently a prediction of Christ. When he arose from the grave, he ascended into heaven, as the Fore-runner of all his redeemed people; and he demanded the opening of those gates of righteousness, that he and they might enter in, and praise the LORD. The ministering angels may be considered as opening the gates of heaven, into which the righteous alone can enter; and then the whole church in chorus, celebrates the praises of God, for having heard their prayers, and become their salvation. The redeemer doubtless is also that "Stone which the builders rejected," and would have thrown aside as worthless among the rubbish; but which by the mighty power of God, and to the astonishment of the apostles and disciples, became the chief corner-stone, supporting the whole spiritual temple, and uniting the several parts of it into one building, "an habitation of God through the Spirit." And as the chief priests, scribes, and Pharisees of old refused this Foundation-stone of the church; so many of the wise, and learned, and professedly religious, of every age and nation ever since, have rejected it, and many of them have long endeavoured to substitute some other in its place. But by the marvellous interposition of the Lord, their attempts have been frustrated, and proved ruinous to themselves and adherents alone. The day of thanksgiving also, which David and Israel celebrated, was but a shadow of that blessed day which saw the Redeemer risen from the dead: that was indeed "the day which the Lord had made" for his people to rejoice in: and it hath ever since been commemorated every week in the Christian church, and in most parts hath had a more solemn annual commemoration. The twenty-second and twenty-third verses are quoted six times in the New-Testament, and expressly applied to Christ; nay, many of the Jewish Rabbies acknowledge this to be a prediction of the Messiah.

V. 25, 26. The word rendered, "Save now," is Hosanna; which seems equivalent to our modern congratulatory prayer on the accession of a monarch to the throne, "God save the king." It is evident that the Jews had this passage in mind, when they said before Christ, at his entrance into Jerusalem, "Hosanna to the Son of David; blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord, Hosanna in the highest." They meant to welcome him as the promised Messiah: but they totally misunderstood the nature of his kingdom and salvation. And our Lord also himself referred to this prophecy, when he said to the priests and rulers, "Ye shall not see me henceforth; till ye shall say, 'Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord.'" The priests from the sanctuary seem to have answered David and his company in the latter clause, "We have blessed you out of the house of the Lord." At length the whole congregation, having met in the courts of the sanctuary, joined in solemn sacrifices and ardent praises: which were typical of the joy and praise of the church on earth and in heaven, on account of the Redeemer's exaltation.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—18.

Whether the believer reviews his former experience, or traces back his comforts to the everlasting goodness and mercy of God; or whether he looks forward, and adverts to those future blessings which are secured to him by the promises of the new covenant; he will be sure to find abundant cause for joy and praise: he will desire to animate others in their several stations, to unite in this delightful work: and this always was, and always will be, the substance of the redeemed sinner's grateful song, "The LORD is good, because his mercy endureth for ever." No poor sinner, in deep distress, ever yet called earnestly upon him, who was not afterwards enabled to say, "The LORD answered me, and set me at liberty;" and every answer to our prayers is an evidence that he is on our side; and then we need not fear what man can do unto us. Whether few or many help us; if he take part with them, they who hate us will be treated as enemies. Seeing we allow that it is far "better to trust in the LORD, than to put confidence even in princes;" but we should take care to act consistently with our judgment: we should not pay court to the rich and powerful, as if they could make us happy or miserable; but without any undue compliances, we should conscientiously do our duty to them and to all men, and trust in the Lord alone to accept and bless us. We may indeed be compassed with enemies, and be disquieted by their malice: but in the name of the Lord we shall be delivered from them, and be victorious over them all, and their rage will only effect their own destruction. And though Satan thrust sore at us, that we may fall into sin or misery; yet trusting in our almighty Friend, we may make head against him and his legions; for "the LORD is the strength and song" of every believer, "and is become his salvation." As we need not dread the rage, so we should not envy the carnal, vain, and vanishing mirth, of the ungodly. For the voice of rational rejoicing and of salvation is in the tabernacles of the righteous; whilst they enjoy the love, are safe under the protection of the powerful and valiant right hand, and are employed in praising the name of the Lord. With peace of conscience, and joy in the Holy Ghost, and liberty to "cast all their cares upon him who careth for them," they possess a lively hope of an incorruptible inheritance: their bodies indeed must drop into the grave; yet they shall not die eternally; "but live, and declare the works of the LORD:" and though he chasten them for their good, repeatedly and sharply, yet he will not "give them over unto death."

V. 19—29.

Renewed mercies and deliverances send believers again and again to the courts of the Lord, that they may enter in and praise his name; and at last, delivered from death and every evil, they will enter the gates of heaven to praise him for evermore. He hath generally chosen and honoured those whom man despised: he hath done good to his people by some, of whom it was said, "How shall these men save us?" And none are more apt to mis-

PSALM CXIX.

Contains a miscellaneous collection of wise maxims, pious ejaculations, holy purposes, gracious experiences, &c.; which cannot with ease and simplicity be arranged under any particular heads; there frequently being little take, and mislead others in these matters, than they who by prescription are deemed, and deem themselves, builders in Zion. We should not then be discouraged by contempt and neglect from "occupying with our talent, till the Lord come:" but attend to our proper work, whatever acceptance it meets with from man, and desire no more but to be approved of God. Every good gift is from him, and the glory of every good work belongs to him: and when beneficial changes are brought about, which "are marvelous in our eyes," we should acknowledge it to be his doing. Gracious deliverances give occasion to days of joy and gladness; such are days which the Lord hath made, and we should remember to rejoice in a holy manner: for carnal mirth and sensual indulgence, when we are rejoicing in the goodness of God, are like offering his corn and wine to Baal. (Hos. ii. 8.) Our thanksgiving on earth must always be accompanied with prayers for further mercies, and the continuance of our prosperity; our Hallelujahs with Hosannas. We should ever pray for those who "come in the name of the Lord," and who evidently in their proper station act by his authority and for his glory; and the blessing of his servants, out of his sanctuary, should be highly valued by the greatest of princes, as eminently conducive to their prosperity. All our success should animate us to abound in spiritual sacrifices to the Lord, who giveth us light and comfort. If he be our God, our Portion, and Salvation, the Object of our cordial worship, and the Lord of our choice, we shall render him willing obedience, and exalt him as we are able; and we shall here begin, and for ever continue to give thanks to him, who is "good, and whose mercy endureth for ever." In all these things our Redeemer is the grand pattern and exemplar of his people. Delivered from great distress, which he endured in our behalf: placed upon a glorious throne, according to his confidence in his heavenly Father, and in answer to his fervent prayers; having overcome every enemy which compassed him about, or "thrust sore at him that he might fall," and ever living to declare the works of the Lord; he hath opened the gates of righteousness to all his people; he hath become our Way of access to his Father's presence, and the Foundation of our hopes and of our souls; and he hath shown us the way to conquer by patience, faith, and prayer. Contemned of the builders, he is become the Foundation and Corner stone of the whole church: and his resurrection, and ascension, and exaltation were marvellous in the eyes of numbers, who acknowledged and rejoiced in them as the Lord's doing. When he left the grave a glorious day commenced, which knows no night: our Sun of righteousness arose to set no more: and our weekly commemoration of that great event on the Lord's day is the connexion between one sentence and another; and the whole, as Mr. Henry remarks, 'rather a chest of gold rings, than a chain of gold links.'

Let us then welcome the return of this day which the Lord hath made, and be glad and rejoice in it: let us beseech him to send prosperity to his preached Gospel, and by it to save the souls of men: let us welcome those who come as ambassadors in the name of Christ; as an evidence that we welcome him to our hearts, and shall welcome him when he comes to judgment: and let us join our prayers for, and kindness to, those who belong to the Redeemer, with our spiritual sacrifices of praise to him our Lord, our God, our Saviour, and our Portion.

NOTES.

PSALM CXIX. V. 1. It is generally allowed, that David composed this most instructive psalm: and it is most probable that he committed to writing, in a detached manner, the several reflections, maxims, and ejaculations contained in it, as they occurred to his mind, amidst the varied scenes of his eventful life; and that, towards the close of it, he collected them into order, for the benefit of his people, and that of the church in every age. The psalm consists of twenty-two sections, (each containing eight verses;) according to the number of the letters in the Hebrew alphabet: and every verse in each section, in the original, begins with that letter which stands as the title to it. It may be supposed that this arrangement was formed, principally, to assist the memory of the reader. The psalm may be considered in a special manner as the touchstone of genuine experience: and so far as any man's views, desires, purposes, and affections, coincide with those of the Psalmist, he may be sure that they come from the influence of the sanctifying Spirit, but no further. The reader's thoughts indeed will frequently be led to the Saviour himself; because he was perfectly what believers are in a measure: and their conformity to him is the evidence of their interest in his divine righteousness. The word of God, under different terms, according to the several parts of which it is composed, is mentioned in almost every verse. Sometimes indeed the connexion will lead the attentive reader to think more of one part than of others: but in general the oracles of God, as then extant, are intended; and it is probable that the term was commonly selected which best suited the metrical arrangement. Six or seven distinct words are used in the first section of eight verses, viz. Law, testimonies, precepts, statutes, commandments, judgments, and ways. Most or all of these terms have been already explained: (Marg. Ref.) but in some instances, it will be necessary again to consider them along with the context.—As the pardoning mercy of God in Christ is the only source of a sinner's happiness ; so the actual enjoyment of that happiness is inseparably connected with devoted obedience, and in a great measure consists in it. The word rendered undefiled, means perfect, or upright, and marks the sound character, the true believer, who sincerely embraces the salvation of God, and conscientiously walks according to his commandments in his habitual conduct.

V. 2, 3. The testimonies of God are the declarations of his truth, and will, however attested ; whether by express declarations, or by instituted ordinances, as pledges of his love to his upright worshippers : and they who credit his word, and attend on his ordinances, and thus seek him with an undivided heart, are happy, and shall be happy. (Marg. Ref.)—Assuredly they practise no iniquity ; they walk in “his ways ;” which “are pleasantness and peace.”

V. 4. What then doth God command us, but diligently to do those very things in which true happiness is to be found ? What doth he forbid us, but to make ourselves and others miserable ?

V. 5. ‘David acknowledgeth his imperfection, desiring God to reform it, that his life might be conformable to God’s word.’ (Notes, xix. 8—14. Rom. vii. 12—25.) ‘The faithful soul, enraptured with the contemplation of that blessedness which is the consequence of serving God, but conscious, at the same time, of an inability to attain to it, sighs after the refreshing and strengthening influences of divine grace. She groans earnestly within herself, and at length breathes forth a wish, that the Spirit of truth and love would fix and establish her in a holy course of thinking, speaking, and acting on all occasions ; and would prevent her from turning aside out of it, to the right hand or to the left.’ (Horne.)—The sudden transition from the preceding reflection to this fervent ejaculation is very beautiful.

V. 6. ‘All the commandments have the same Author, and the same sanction. He who thinketh to atone for failure in one, by the observance of another,—is a hypocrite, and, unless he repent, will be brought to shame, if not before men here, yet before men and angels hereafter.’ (Horne.)—Notwithstanding manifold imperfections, that man will never be thus put to shame, who unreservedly has respect to all God’s commandments, as the rule of his conduct, and humbly repents of every deviation from them.

V. 7. ‘The Scriptures contain an account of God’s righteous judgments ; or his decrees and determinations concerning us, with a history of cases and precedents, entered upon record for our admonition. By these we are to form our opinion and regulate our conduct : and when we shall have so learned these, as to walk according to them, we shall praise God with an upright heart.’ (Horne.)

V. 8. ‘He refuseth not to be tried with temptations ; but he feareth not faint, if God succour not his infirmity in time.’ (Notes, i. xxxii.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, on ALEPH.

It is the will of God that we should wisely seek our own happiness : our self-love indeed should be properly directed and subordinated ; but it cannot and ought not to be extirpated. Experience, (as well as the sacred Scriptures,) testifies, that “Blessed are the undefiled in the way, who walk in the law of the LORD.” Had sin never existed, misery had been unknown : and now that the way of pardon and reconciliation has been opened by the Lord Jesus Christ, we ascend to felicity in proportion as we are renewed to holiness ; and it is our highest privilege on earth to commune with God, and bear his image ; to attend on his ordinances, rely on his promises, and, avoiding all iniquity, to walk in his ways. Believers are indeed not exposed to the condemning sentence of the law ; yet the Lord “hath commanded them to keep his precepts diligently ;” and their obligations to obedience are increased in proportion to the mercies they have received. Indeed this grateful obedience corresponds to the dispositions of their hearts. The genuine disciple of Christ could not rely on His righteousness for justification, did he not see that excellency and beauty in it, which make him long to transcribe it in his own conduct, and to have his soul cast into the very mould of it. His heart consents to every precept of the holy law that it is good ; he would not have one of them repealed, mitigated, or altered ; he only grieves that he no more comes up to this perfect standard, and, with many a sigh, he says to the Lord, “O that my ways were directed to keep thy statutes !” He knows, that if a man only respects some of the commandments, and expects by one instance of obedience to purchase an indulgence for disobedience in another, his hypocrisy will be detected by his partiality ; and that if he be not made ashamed in this world, everlasting contempt will be his portion. Therefore he desires to have respect unto all God’s commandments. And as he could have no confidence before the mercy-seat now, so he could not hope to stand with confidence before the judgment-seat at last, if he allowed himself to despise or violate one of them. This man therefore will not only pray to be directed and enabled to obey, as far as he knows the will of God, but to be taught it, in all those things, which have hitherto been concealed from him; and he is disposed with uprightness of heart, to praise the Lord for every new discovery which he makes in his righteous judgments. As his desire and purpose are to keep the statutes of God, so his dependence is upon him to enable him and comfort him in so doing. And though the Lord may leave such a servant to feel his own weakness, when struggling with difficulties and temptation: yet he will hear his prayer, when he earnestly entreats him that he would not utterly forsake him.

NOTES.

V. 9. Many maxims and rules have been laid down for regulating the manners and forming the principles of young persons: but a constant attention to their conduct, and an habitual comparison of their opinions, words, tempers, affections and actions, with the sacred Scriptures, so as to aim daily at nearer and nearer conformity, is of itself sufficient, and without this all else is totally inadequate.
 We may suppose that David made this inquiry for his own use, in the dangerous and important season of youth; and then published it in his old age for the benefit of others.
 ‘He, who became man for our salvation, passed through ‘this state of youth undefiled, that he might, as it were, ‘reclaim, and consecrate it anew to God. Let every young ‘man frequently meditate on this circumstance.’ (Horne.)

V. 10. O let, &c. “Do not thrust me away from ‘thy commandments.’”—“Do not cause me to wander, ‘&c.’”—The Psalmist was conscious that God might justly reject his imperfect services; and that both the will and power of obeying, as well as pardon and acceptance, were to be sought from his free mercy and grace.

V. 11. David treasured up the truths, promises, precepts, and instructions of the sacred oracles in his memory, and endeavoured to form his judgment, to direct his conscience, and to regulate his affections according to them:
 and having thus lodged them in his heart, they were securely hidden from every enemy, nor could he be robbed of them. Thus he used the Scriptures as his antidote against the contagion of sin and temptation.

V. 13. Judgments. This word seems to mean the decisions of the infinite wisdom and justice of God, whether they concern truths, facts, duties, or persons. By these decisions we ought to judge, and by them we shall be judged.

V. 14. ‘Truth and holiness afford to the sincere be‘liever a pleasure more exquisite, as well as more solid ‘and enduring, than that which the miser feels at the ‘acquisition of his darling wealth. These true riches we ‘may always acquire.’ (Horne.)

V. 15. ‘Meditation is that exercise of the mind where‘by it recalls a known truth, as some kinds of creatures do ‘their food, to be ruminated upon, until all the nutritious ‘parts are extracted and fitted for the purpose of life.’
 (Horne.)

V. 17. “Recompense thy servant; I will live and “keep thy word.” Or, “confer a favour on thy servant, “that I may live and keep thy word.” The verse may be understood either way. ‘He sheweth that we ought not ‘to desire to live, but to serve God.’ If the Lord communicate to us the spiritual life abundantly, we shall be proportionably obedient to his word; and this will be both an additional obligation conferred on us, and a gracious recompense of our imperfect services hitherto.

V. 18. “Reveal,” or unveil mine eyes, &c. The moral law of God showed the Israelites their need of a Saviour; and it also displays the holiness of God, the nature of heavenly happiness in conformity to him, and the believer’s path through this evil world. But under the ceremonial law, the wonders of redeeming love were veiled.
 Believers among the Israelites well knew that the external institutions of the law typified some deep and spiritual mysteries: and they understood them, in proportion to their degree of divine illumination, and as far as was necessary for their support, comfort, and direction in the path of life; yet probably with much less distinctness than real Christians now do. But under every dispensation, the veil of prejudice, pride, and carnal affections, must be removed from the heart of fallen man; or he will never understand the nature and glory of divine truth. “If the “word of God be the lesson, the Spirit of God must be

2 Tim. iii. 15—17.—^j Heb. men of my counsel.

V. 19—21. These verses contain arguments with which the Psalmist enforced his plea for divine teaching. Being a stranger on earth, and journeying to his home in heaven, he knew that he should lose his way, if the commandments of God were unknown to him, or mistaken by him. He had been led to desire the knowledge of the truths and precepts of revelation, with such intenseness, that his soul was constantly ready to break, or faint, when at any time he dreaded being left in ignorance and error. And he was sensible that the proud, the obstinate impenitent sinner, remained under the wrath and curse of God, and would meet with severe rebukes here, as as well misery hereafter: and therefore he earnestly deprecated the doom of such wicked men. 'This disposition is not a transient fit; but it is constant and uniform at all times.' (Horne.) 'Seeing man's life in this world is but a passage, what should become of a man, if thy word were not his guide?'

V. 22. 'Remove from me that disgrace and shame, unto which they expose me as a traitor; for I am not guilty of any such wickedness, but carefully observe thy testimonies.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 23. Saul and his courtiers, sitting in council, and speaking all manner of evil falsely against David, and conspiring together to take away his life; whilst he was meditating upon and praying over the word of God, that he might learn and practise his duty towards them and all men, and might find comfort from the precious promises; was a type of the Jewish sanhedrim, consulting together to put Jesus to death, whilst he was employed in healing and teaching the people, and doing all manner of good to those that were willing to receive benefit by him.

V. 24. The Psalmist not only found his joy and comfort in God's word; but he made it his counsellor; and closely adhered to its decisions, as princes do to the unanimous opinion of their most approved advisers.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, on BETH and GIMEL.

The season of youth is peculiarly dangerous and important: the comfort and usefulness of future life often greatly depend on our conduct when the passions are most strong, and we are most destitute of knowledge and experience: and the hopes of the church and of society, for a succession of useful members, are placed upon the rising generation. Every one ought, therefore, to contribute all in his power to preserve young persons from the fatal effects of their own headstrong passions, of an ensnaring world, and of artful seducers, that they may not contract early bad habits, and form ruinous connexions. And when young persons are convinced of the desirableness of having their way made and preserved pure from the pollution of sin, their general rule is, to take heed to it according to the precepts, cautions, and encouragements of the word of God. Thus David from his youth sought the Lord with his whole heart; and in answer to his prayers was kept from wandering from his commandments: he reposed the sacred Scriptures in his inmost soul, and was by them kept from sinning against God. Let every youthful reader copy this example; yea, let us all be thus followers of him and of the Lord Jesus. If God be both perfectly holy and perfectly happy, and if his blessedness be the result of his infinite excellency; how absurd must it be to expect happiness by being contrary to him, and rebelling against him! Rather let this be our plea with him to teach us his statutes, that, being partakers of his holiness, we may also participate his blessedness; and then we may with propriety and efficacy declare the judgments of his mouth, for the instruction of others also. For the experienced believer finds far greater joy in the ways of his testimonies, than wealth can confer: and these joys and riches alone are attainable by all who covet and seek them. But then we must frequently meditate upon the precepts of our God, reduce our knowledge to practice, and have respect to all his ways; and if we be careful not to forget any part of his word, we shall soon delight ourselves in his ordinances and commandments. The Lord dealeth very bountifully with all his servants; who being delivered from the wrath to come, and raised from the death of sin, find true life in keeping his word: but they need more and more mercies, and long for fuller divine illumination. Every discovery which they make of the wondrous things revealed in the Scriptures, increases their earnest desire of having the eyes of their understanding opened to still clearer perceptions of divine truths: and every lively emotion of love and gratitude makes them long and pray for more fervent affections. As perfect knowledge and love are reserved for their portion in heaven; they feel themselves strangers here on earth: they fear missing their way, even in part; lest they should lose the solace of walking with God, by erring from his commandments. Their anxiety on this account often interrupts their enjoyment, and makes them "groan being burdened:" especially if darkness and temptation so oppress their minds, as to render them afraid of having their portion with the proud and impenitent, whom God resists. This is the reproach which they most dread; though the contempt and calumny of men are sometimes distressing to their minds, and excite prayers for the removal of them. But when either princes or peasants speak against them, as the servants of God, they would be occupied in meditation on the Scriptures; not only because their delight is in his testimonies, but because they desire from thence to be counselled how to behave; in order that by well-doing they may put to silence those, who would falsely accuse them : and in every trouble and perplexity, they make them their delight and their counsellors. Such are the desires, purposes, and experiences of the true Christian, in proportion to his degree of knowledge and grace : May the Lord help us to look in this glass, that we may know what we are ; and that we may be directed in exercising repentance of sin, and faith in Christ, and ‘in amending our lives according to his holy word.’ And may we learn to avoid all altercation with our revilers, who can only injure us, when they interrupt our devotions, or ruffle our tempers.

NOTES.

V. 25. Many understand this verse, merely as a complaint on account of deep affliction and peril of death, and as a prayer for the preservation of life : yet the Psalmist seems to have been conscious, that, compared with his better judgment and the perfect standard of duty, his affections were too apt to cleave to worldly objects which are but dust ; so that he prayed for enlivening grace to render him more spiritually-minded. The word rendered quicken me, signifies, cause me to live ; and may mean either, preserve my life, give me life, or let me have more abundant life ; or according to a mode of expression peculiar to our language, Let me not only live, but be lively ; Let me have “life more abundantly.” (Marg. Ref.) As the preservation of David’s life from Saul’s persecution was engaged for by special promise ; so quickening grace in answer to prayer is promised in every part of scripture, or at least such prayers accord to the spirit of the whole sacred volume.

V. 26. ‘We should freely and ingenuously declare to God in prayer our sins, our temptations, our sorrows, and our undertakings : it argues love, confidence, and sincerity ; it is a means of acquainting us with our own state, of which generally we are ignorant ; and it will not fail to procure those aids from above, of which we stand in need. God will hear us ; he will pardon us our offences, strengthen us in our trials, dispel our grief, and prosper the work of our hands upon us.’ (Horne.) It is worthy of special notice, how often, and in what varied connexions, David, in this psalm, prays to be taught the statutes of God ; though he seems to have been more intimately acquainted with the sacred oracles, as then extant, than almost any other man was : but he knew, that divine teaching alone could enable him rightly to understand the Scriptures, and to apply general rules to all the variety of particular cases, which occurred in the course of his life. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 28. Heaviness. David’s heaviness might in part arise from his outward trials : but he seems to have spoken as one distressed in mind, because he got no more ground against sin, and as needing strength to resist temptation. ‘Let us not marvel if sin bring us to the knowledge of sorrow, since he who “knew no sin,” was yet, on our account, so intimately acquainted with grief. In the garden his soul melted for heaviness. Our transgressions deserve an eternity of sorrow : let us not therefore repine at any portion of it, that may fall to our share in time.—No, blessed Jesus, let us suffer with thee, both as a means and pledge of our future glorification with thee. Only strengthen us, according to the promises in thy word.’ (Horne.)

V. 29, 30. The way of lying, and the way of truth, are here opposed to each other. The way of truth means that true way which God hath revealed, by which we may come to him and walk with him. The way of lying means therefore all those false ways, by which men deceive themselves and others, or are deceived by Satan and his instruments. False doctrine, therefore, hypocrisy, and whatever is contrary to the faith and holiness of the Gospel, are intended by the way of lying. The sound of the words indeed has led some to suppose, that David had been habitually addicted to the sin of lying, from which he prayed to be delivered ; and some instances are mentioned in which he deviated from truth. But though a believer may fall into any sin ; he cannot habitually practise any one, knowing it to be so : and the original by no means admits of this lax interpretation. “Grant me thy law graciously,” is a prayer that God would in mercy write his law in the Psalmist’s heart, and enable him to obey it ; which he would consider a special instance of undeserved favour or grace.—Having “chosen the way of truth,” he laid the judgments of God before him for hourly direction, and admonition.

V. 31. The word rendered stuck, is the same which is before translated, cleave : and the conflict between grace cleaving to the Lord’s testimonies, and the remainder of indwelling sin cleaving to the dust, is best understood by those who “delight in the law of God after the inward man, but find another law in their members warring against the law of their mind,” so that, “they cannot do the things that they would.” The Psalmist adhered to the testimonies of God, however, so closely, notwithstanding this inward conflict, that neither temptations nor persecutions should induce him to draw back. So also did the apostle, and so do all that delight in the law of God.

V. 32. “I will run the way of thy commandments; “for thou wilt enlarge my heart.” This is the most literal rendering. ‘By this he sheweth, that we can neither ‘choose good, cleave to God’s word, nor run forward in his ‘way, except he make our hearts large to receive grace,
‘and willing to obey.’

V. 33. They, who are taught by the Lord the way of his statutes, will keep it to the end: and the reason why so many draw back is intimated; namely, they have only been taught by men. (1 John ii. 19, 20.) ‘He sheweth ‘that he cannot follow on to the end, except God teach ‘him oft times, and lead him forward.’

V. 34. ‘Much understanding is needful, in order to ‘the observation of the law; that we may know what is ‘commanded, and what is forbidden, and how far; that ‘we may avoid the snares laid for us in the way of duty;
‘that we may respect things according to their due rank
‘and worth; that we may do good works in their proper ‘place, time, and manner: above all, that the affections ‘may be directed by the judgment, not the judgment by ‘the affections.’ (Horne.) “With my whole heart,” ‘not only in outward conversation, but also in inward af‘fection.’

V. 35. Delight. ‘Happy the soul, that can say, “Therein do I delight.” (Horne.) The character, described in the seventh of Romans, “delighted in the law of “God, after the inward man;” and the longings and prayers of the man after God’s own heart continually remind us of the struggles and complaints, spoken of in that well known portion of holy writ.

V. 36. In proportion as the heart is inclined by divine grace, to the testimonies of God; to ‘desire what he pro‘mises and love what he commands,’ the inclination or propensity to covetousness must be mortified: and when the LORD leaves a man to himself, his heart will of course be inclined to evil. ‘Hereby meaning all other vices, because ‘that covetousness is the root of all evil.’

V. 37. ‘Help me to overlook those worldly honours

‘and fading beauties, which we are apt to behold with ‘too much admiration; and with lively affections and vi‘gorous endeavours, to persist in the pursuit of thy favour,
‘and in the way which thou hast set before me.’ (Bp.
Patrick.) The eyes seem put for all the senses, which are the inlets of temptation to the heart, and through which every kind of concupiscence is excited.

V. 38. The promises of God’s word greatly relate to the preservation and sanctification of the true believer. David, being conscious that he was the Lord’s servant, and much afraid of offending or forsaking him, prayed to have these promises established, or performed to his soul; that the effects of the deceitfulness of his heart, and of the force of temptation, might be prevented.

V. 39. ‘Let me not fall to thy dishonour; but let my ‘heart still delight in thy gracious word.’ The excellency of the judgments, decisions, maxims, or precepts of the sacred word, would aggravate the guilt and disgrace of acting contrary to them; and this seems to have been the reproach that David was afraid of.

V. 40. ‘Doth not my heart thy precepts love,

‘And long to see thy face?’

‘And yet how slow my spirits move,

‘Without enlivening grace.’ (Watts.)

V. 41, 42. ‘He sheweth that God’s mercy and love ‘is the first cause of our salvation.’ ‘By trusting in ‘God’s word he assureth himself to be able to confute the ‘slanders of his enemies.’ When David was driven away by Absalom, Shimei loaded him with reproaches, as if God had rejected him for his crimes, and as if his confidence in God had been presumptuous. When Christ was nailed to the cross, the chief priests reviled him, saying, “He trusted in God: let him deliver him now if he will “have him; for he said, I am the Son of God.” But the restoration of David to his throne, and the resurrection of Christ from the dead, furnished a sufficient answer to these reproaches: and the complete salvation of true believers will for ever silence and put to shame, all those who have derided and slandered them, during their trials and difficulties.

V. 43. When David was left in uncertainty and distress about his personal concerns, his confidence in discussing upon the truths of the Scriptures, and the faithfulness of God to his promises, was abated: he therefore prayed that he might not be so far discouraged, as to be entirely put to silence on these favourite subjects; seeing he had avowed his hope that God would decide for him and against his enemies, according to his perfect wisdom, justice, and truth.

V. 44. The language of this verse is peculiarly empha-tical, "I shall keep thy law perpetually, for ever, yea, for ever and ever." Perfect obedience will constitute a large proportion of heavenly happiness to all eternity.

V. 45. The service of God is perfect freedom; every deviation is proportionable slavery to sin and Satan.

V. 46. David, before his accession to the throne, was often in the presence of Saul, and of Achish king of Gath, and afterwards he became a companion of kings:
but he was determined in no case to conceal his religion, or to be ashamed of speaking his whole mind on that subject.

V. 48. To lift up the hands, implies earnestness and encouragement in any business; thus David purposed to take courage, and be very earnest in keeping God's commandments. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, on DALETH, HE, and VAU.

Whilst the children of this world cleave wholly to the dust of the earth as their portion, and are neither alarmed nor humbled on that account; the children of light are often greatly burdened, because of the remains of carnal affections in their hearts. Their judgment and choice lead them to "seek those things which are above:" yet they feel that their souls often grovel here on earth; and whilst others perhaps think that they are soaring to the very heavens in faith and love, they are complaining before God that "their souls cleave to the dust;" and beseeching him to enliven their affections, and invigorate their endeavours, that they may rise superior to worldly cares and interests, and be more entirely taken up about the superior concerns of eternity. And his word encourages, and by his grace he will answer and grant, these good desires which he hath planted in our hearts.—The experienced believer communes with his God in the confidence of faith and love: he unreservedly declares before him all his ways, and all the difficulties and perplexities that he meets with;
nay, he confesses before him, without desiring to conceal or to palliate any thing, all the sins of his life and of his heart; and the consciousness of this being his habitual practice encourages his hope of pardon and assistance from his heavenly Father. When we indeed desire to obey God's precepts, we may be sure that he will hear our prayers to be made acquainted with them: and with all our external advantages we shall need this divine teaching; for otherwise our natural pride, self-love, and love of sin, together with our contracted prejudices, will close our minds against the truth, and involve us in error and uncertainty.—They who most delight in serving God, and in speaking of his wondrous works, may for a season be in great heaviness, and their souls be even melted within them through manifold temptations: but they will pray, and the Lord will hear: and he hath promised that "as their day is, so shall their strength be." Having chosen the way of truth, and laid the Scriptures before us as our rule, we may pray in faith to be kept at a distance from all false doctrine and hypocrisy, and to be graciously led into a fuller knowledge of the divine will: and sincerity in our hearts towards God will best preserve us from all dissimulation in our dealings with men. When we have entered upon this course of life, we must persevere in it:

and the Lord will never suffer those to be put to shame, who "have stuck to his testimonies," steadfastly professing his truth and doing his will, without being moved by the frowns or smiles of the world to turn aside from him. But though the believer habitually travels on the way to heaven, yet he is often grieved to find that he gets on no faster; and he still prays to be set at liberty from every remainder of the bondage of sin, "that he may run the way of God's commandments with an enlarged heart." He desires to proceed with increasing speed, even unto the end: he wants knowledge in order to practice: he measures the degree of men's wisdom by that of their piety and obedience to God: he prays to be made of good understanding in the way of godliness; and to be inclined and enabled to walk in it, not only because it is the path of duty, but because he delights in it. Yet he still feels his heart capable of entertaining an inordinate desire after worldly things, and of coveting wealth by which they may all be purchased. Against these emotions of covetousness he watches; and he prays unto his God not to permit his heart to be in any degree inclined to it.
He knows that all below is vanity and vexation of spirit:
but he fears lest through the outward senses concupiscence should be excited in his heart: and therefore he entreats the Lord to turn away his eyes, and to close all his senses against every object, which can pollute his imagination, or kindle forbidden desires in his heart; or which might cause him to loiter in the way in which he would be quicken and not retarded. He therefore pleads the promises of God's word, and desires that they may be confirm with him, and performed to him; as one who would devote himself to the fear and worship of his name: and he prays to be delivered from the reproach of hypocrisy, or apostacy, or a disgraceful walk, which he more dreads than the contempt of men. Knowing that all the judgments of God are just and good, he above all things dreads falling under his rebuke, or condemnation; and to be assured of escaping them, he longs after his precepts, and to make progress in his righteousness. But when he hath done all, he feels himself to be a poor sinful creature: his only dependence still is upon the rich mercies of God, and he desires the salvation which is promised in his word. Every present deliverance from sin and trouble serves to silence the reproaches of his calumniators: and he knows that when his salvation shall be completed, every accuser will be answered, and every aspersion wiped from his character. In the mean time he wants encouragement and assistance in speaking of the word of truth, of the happiness of God's people, and of his righteous judgments, for the quickening of some, and the conviction of others, with whom he converses. He has no idea of final happiness, or of perfect liberty, but in keeping of the divine law continually, even for ever and ever: and therefore he now seeks out God's precepts, that he may obey them; in order that on earth he may, as much as possible, anticipate the liberty and felicity of heaven. Should such a believer be called, either by the duties of his station, or by persecution, to stand before kings; he will neither be ashamed nor afraid to speak of God's testimonies with all plainness and simplicity. If bonds and imprisonment should be the consequence; he will find delight in those commandments which he hath loved: and in every case he will seek his pleasure, not from the indulgence of sensual appetites or malignant passions, but in diligently studying and obeying the commandments of his God. Something of this mind of Christ is in every true disciple: but very few of them have arrived at that maturity of judgment, and vigour of holy affections, which David possessed. Our evidence, however, that we are the people of God is exactly proportionable. All is defective in our judgment and affections which comes short of this; all false and delusive in our supposed experience which runs counter to it.

NOTES.

V. 49. The Psalmist seems here especially to mean the promise of the kingdom to himself and his posterity, which God had made to him, when he thought of no such thing; and thus raised in him expectations which subsequent events threatened to frustrate. But the same plea is good, as to any expectation which is clearly grounded on the word of God; 'Remember, O Lord, that thou hast given this promise, and encouraged my hope in it: and whatever appearances may be, I must wait and pray for the accomplishment of it; for thou wilt never disappoint the expectation, which thy own word hath excited.'

V. 50-53. Some render these verses in connexion, as follows: "This is my comfort in my affliction: that thy word quickens," or enlivens, "me; that, while the proud exceedingly deride me, I do not decline from thy law; that I remember thy righteous judgments of old, and thence encourage myself; that the tempest arises against me from the wicked, who forsake thy law."—The effect of the sacred word in animating the Psalmist's hope, zeal, and diligence; his consciousness of adhering to the commands of God, though "filled with the contempt of the scornful;" his meditation on the righteous judgments of God on his enemies, and his interpositions in behalf of his servants: and the evidently bad character of his furious persecutors, combined to encourage his hope of a happy event to his distresses. Or, the "horror" which he felt, when he reflected on the doom that awaited the wicked, was a testimony of his conscience, that he was actuated by a spirit of love, and not of revenge, and thus a source of comfort. (Marg. Ref.) 'The haughty infidel will scoff at the true servant of God, for one part of his conduct; the insolent worldling will ridicule him for another: but neither will induce him to disbelieve, or to disobey.' (Horne.) 'I have called to mind, O Lord, how, in all foregoing ages, thou hast suffered good men to fall into calamities, thereby to render them at last the more illustrious: and with this consideration also I comforted myself.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 54-56. The Psalmist in these verses still seems to be pointing out the sources of his consolation. In his wanderings from place to place like a weary pilgrim, wherever he pitched his tent, he solaced himself, by composing and singing hymns and psalms, in praise of the statutes and ordinances of God. He meditated when others slept, on the divine perfections, and thus was confirmed in his purposes of obeying the divine law: and indeed all his supports and the cheerful composure of his mind under his dangers and calamities, were a gracious recompense of his obedient regard to the word of God.

V. 57—63. In the former section, the Psalmist stated the chief sources of his consolation : in this, he expresses his full confidence, that God was his Portion ; and “ the “ reason of this hope that was in him.” He had formed, and avowed, his purpose of adhering to the words of God, keeping them as his valued treasure, and observing them in his habitual conduct : He had earnestly from his inmost soul sought the favour of God, and the mercy promised in his word. He had thought on his ways, in order that he might repent of all his sins, and do works meet for repentance ; forsaking every evil course, and turning his feet into the paths of truth and holiness. Having “ come to himself,” and “ considered his ways ;” he made no delay to comply with the dictates of his conscience, in obeying God’s commandments : (Marg. Ref.) and when the wicked laid snares for him, robbed him, or persecuted him, he was not, by this unmerited ill usage, so discomposed as to forget the law of God ; but still made it the rule of his conduct. Nay, his distress and dangers rendered him the more earnest in his religion ; and every interposition of God for his deliverance and the confusion of his persecutors, and the recollection of the Lord’s righteous judgments of old, excited in him such lively gratitude, that he often arose, even in the middle of the night, to bless and thank his God. At the same time, he chose for his companions, not the most wealthy, ingenious, or valiant, but the most pious persons that he knew ; and while hated by the wicked, he was welcomed with affection and reciprocal regard, by all that feared God and kept his precepts. He could appeal to the Searcher of hearts for the truth of all this : and therefore he could not doubt, but that the Lord was his Portion, and his everlasting Felicity. It is exceedingly desirable to be habitually disposed to bless God in all circumstances ; as there is no situation on earth, in which a sinner has not cause to be thankful ; much more a believing sinner. We are not indeed required to arise at midnight to give thanks to our God ; but if we are by any means kept from sleep, it will prove a comfortable and profitable employment : and when we consider for what vile purposes multitudes are awake at that hour ; we shall feel some shame to be more reluctant to retrench from our sleep in order to serve our God, than they are in serving their divers lusts and passions. (Notes, Acts xvi. 25—40.)

V. 64. ‘The knowledge of God’s word is a singular ‘ token of his favour.’

V. 66. This verse may literally be rendered ; “ Teach “ me goodness, judgment, and knowledge ; for I have “ believed thy commandments.” Thou hast shown great ‘ kindness to me, O Lord, teach me to imitate thy goodness.’ ‘The word (translated judgment,) signifies, the ‘ faculty of discerning, distinguishing, and judging rightly ‘ of things moral and spiritual ; as the palate doth of meats, ‘ by their different flavours and qualities. Without this ‘ taste, we mistake falsehood for truth in our studies, and ‘ wrong for right in our practice ; superstition and enthusiasm may pass with us for religion, or licentiousness may ‘ intrude under the notion of liberty : in a word, our learning and knowledge prove useless, if not prejudicial to ‘ us. A sound mind therefore, should above all things, be ‘ desired of God in our prayers.’ (Horne.) David had believed the divine authority and excellency of the holy law ; and that it was worthy of all obedience ; the rule of happiness as well as of duty.

V. 67. ‘He confesseth, that before he was chastened, he was rebellious, as man by nature is.’ ‘The ‘ use of God’s rod is to bring us home to himself.’ (Marg. Ref.)

V. 68. ‘Thou art kind, O Lord, and in thy kindness ‘ teach me thy statutes.’ (Septuagint.) ‘Thou art, in ‘ thine own nature, kind and good,—who designest our ‘ good, even when thou afflictest us ; take what methods ‘ thou pleasest with me, only teach me effectually to do as ‘ thou wouldst have me.’ (Bp. Patrick.) The Psalmist seems to say, ‘Thou art so good, that I shall consider the sharpest afflictions as sent in kindness, in order to teach me thy statutes.’

V. 70. The fat in animals is supposed to be without feeling. That insensibility of heart to God's promises, threatenings, and judgments, and to the concerns of other men, which results from indulged luxury, lust, or avarice, is aptly described by this similitude. 'Their heart is indurate and hardened with prosperity and vain estimation of themselves.'—The word of God is 'the delight of temperate and holy persons, who gladly fly from large companies, full tables, costly meats, and rich wines, to enjoy in private the more exalted pleasures of abstinence, meditation, and prayer. (Horne.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, on ZAIN, CHETH, and TETH.

The Lord himself teaches and enables his servants to rely on his word: yet he often delays to answer their expectations, in order to excite their desires, to exercise their faith, to prove their sincerity, and to perfect their patience. This leads them to remind him of his promises, and humbly to plead for their accomplishment. Thus they often find the sweetest comforts when they are most afflicted: for as the sacred word was the instrument by which they were quickened when dead in trespasses and sins; so the Comforter revives and cheers them, when they are ready to faint under trials, by giving them cordials from the same unfailing resource. Infidels, Pharisees, misers, libertines, and all the sons of pride and rebellion, will deride as visionaries and enthusiasts those who thus speak of communion with God and joy in him: but we must not on that account "decline from his word." The remembrance of his judgments of old on the despisers of his servants, and his deliverance of them from trouble, may give us comfort under such contempt: and the prospect of that perdition which awaits the impenitent, may well fill us with horror whenever we think of them, and turn all our resentment into compassion and prayers. The believer dwells on earth, in the body, as in the house of his pilgrimage; ere long he will be "absent from the body and present with the Lord:" in the mean time the word and works of God supply him with subjects for joyful meditation and grateful praise. In the season of affliction, and in the silent hours of the night, he remembers the name of his God, and is thus animated to cheerful obedience: and the Lord graciously recompenses these services by rendering the observance of his precepts daily more easy and pleasant. Who can be sufficiently thankful, that sinners when penitent may rejoice in the infinite and all-sufficient God, and hope that he will, to all eternity, employ his perfections in rendering them happy! But what words can express the folly and madness of those, who prefer this present world as their portion, though it be connected with the everlasting wrath of God! Yet so depraved is man, that we are all disposed to make this bad choice; and special grace alone can enable us to say from our experience, "Thou art my Portion, O LORD; I have said, that I will keep thy words." Yet surely the favour of the Almighty is worthy of being

"entreated with our whole heart;" and we cannot be too instant with him to be merciful unto us according to his word: and no one ever thus entreated him in vain. We should frequently think on our ways, and review our past and present conduct with great accuracy, comparing all our thoughts, words, and works with the law of God; if we would either perceive our perishing want of the salvation of the Gospel, or our need of repentance, and of turning our feet into the ways of holy obedience. As the interests of eternity are at stake, it behooves sinners to make haste and not delay, to escape from the brink of that tremendous precipice on which they have so long trifled; and the believer will be equally in haste to obtain assurance of his safety, and to glorify his God by keeping his commandments. If the wicked combine to defraud us of our property, and the proud forge lies against us; we should be rendered the more obedient and attentive to the precepts of God, that we may ensure the true riches and live down calumny. It argues great grace, when we can be cheerful and thankful under great injuries, without being interrupted by regretting our losses, or resenting our ill usage, from praising the Lord for all his righteous judgments; and when troubles and dangers that break our rest, only make us to solace ourselves the more with thankfulness for our remaining unmerited mercies. The more the wicked hate God's people, the greater union should subsist amongst them; that they may comfort and edify, and pray for, each other. Thus the communion of saints assists, as well as evidences, their communion with God. In this grand concern, party-distinctions, and other discriminations should be but little regarded: for were we all like our Master, even the saint upon a throne would associate with the saint in a cottage, without deducting from his real dignity, and without leading his poor brother to neglect the duties of his inferior station: and we should all prefer the company of the meanest and simplest who fear God and keep his precepts, to that of the most polished, ingenious, or honourable of the ungodly. As the earth is filled with the unmerited blessings of Providence, and with the glad tidings of free salvation; we should be instant in prayer to be taught the statutes of the Lord, that our hearts also may be filled with his mercy, grace, and peace: and repetitions in our requests will not be condemned, unless they be vain and unmeaning. Every past mercy of God to his servants, according to his word, encourages them to pray for more wisdom and grace; that "their love may more and more abound in knowledge and in all judgment;" and that having believed, they may experience, the happiness of keeping God's commandments. To the reproach of our fallen nature, prosperity commonly produces ungodliness: and adversity is the frequent means of exciting men to the consideration of religious subjects. Many have said, "Before I was afflicted I went astray; but now have I kept thy word:" and "it was good for me, that I was afflicted, that I might learn thy statutes." This should reconcile the afflicted to their trials, and teach them to improve them; and it should lead us all to leave our comcerns to the disposal of God, seeing we know not what is good for us. For it is far better to learn by sufferings to delight in God's word, and to value it more than thousands of gold and silver; than by prosperity to grow callous, and ripe for eternal destruction. But how dreadful is the case of those who are hardened in sin, even in the furnace of affliction! Let us then still beseech our God, "who is "good, and doeth good," to teach us his statutes, and to incline our hearts to faith, obedience, and submission to his holy will.

NOTES.

V. 73. 'Thy hands have made and established me; "Make me wise, and I shall learn thy commandments:" 'and thus be capable of answering the grand purpose of 'my creation.'

V. 74. 'It will be a great encouragement to all good 'men when they see me delivered out of all these troubles: for thereby they will be confirmed in their belief 'of thy faithfulness to thy promises; on which, it will 'appear that I have not vainly depended, though I stay 'long for the performance.' (Bp. Patrick.)—David's cheerfulness under his trials, also, was suited to comfort the hearts of those pious persons who witnessed it.

V. 75. 'These heavy afflictions which have befallen 'me are perfectly righteous, and will only make thy 'faithfulness at last the more illustrious.' (Bp. Patrick.)—It should also be noted, that chastening is a promised blessing to the children of God; who are bound to own the fulfilment of the promise, while enduring the salutary discipline.

V. 76. The persuasion that sin is pardoned and God reconciled, with peace in the heart and conscience by the power of the Holy Spirit, according to the promises of Scripture, will make the believer comfortable even before his trials are removed. For this David prayed, as well as for deliverance.

V. 77. Without pardoning mercy, the sinner remains under the sentence of eternal death; and without experiencing the tender compassion of God, the believer has little enjoyment of life here, or hope of eternal life hereafter: but they who delight in God's law, will surely at last rejoice in his tender mercies.

V. 78, 79. Or, "The proud shall be ashamed, &c." 'Those that fear thee, and have known thy testimonies, 'shall be turned to me.' It may be considered as the language of assured hope, rather than of prayer.

V. 80. The word rendered sound, signifies perfections; soundness of heart, denotes thorough integrity and sincerity in professed dependence on God and devotedness to him; and this is opposed to every kind and degree of hypocrisy: as the vigorous appearance, which springs from a firm and healthy constitution, differs from that corpulency and florid complexion, frequently attending some fatal diseases, or a decay of the vital parts.

V. 81, 82. Some think that David here spoke the language of the ancient church, as waiting for the coming of the promised Messiah, the salvation of God, and the consolation of Israel. But he seems rather to have expressed the state of his mind whilst he expected to be delivered by his merciful God, from his sins, his foes, and his fears. Nothing short of this could satisfy his soul: for this he longed and hoped on the ground of God's promises: but "hope deferred made his heart sick and faint:" and his eyes were fatigued, and failed, in looking out for the tokens and comforts of this expected salvation; as all know to be the case, when they long and look in vain for the arrival of some expected and much beloved friend.

V. 83. Bottles made of skins would shrivel up, and become unsightly and useless, by hanging in the heat and smoke. Thus David seemed to himself to become useless and despicable through the infirmities of age, and his manifold trials and sufferings.

V. 84. David here either inquired, How long the Lord would permit his servant to be thus afflicted? Or, whether he meant him to spend his few remaining days under persecution: and to close his life without seeing Him arise to plead his cause, and avenge him on his unrighteous persecutors? The time seemed long, from Samuel's anointing David to the kingdom, till God, by inflicting judgment on his persecutors, fulfilled his promises: especially as it was spent in great danger and hardship.

V. 85. In order to take the wild beasts, in those countries where they abound, they dig deep pits, and cover them over carefully with turf, supported by very slender twigs. The wild beasts walking over these pits fall in, and are taken alive. Thus David's enemies employed craft, as well as power, for his ruin; without regard to the law of God, nay, in direct contempt of it!

V. 86. The Psalmist contrasts the commandments of God, as requiring truth and faithfulness, with the unfaithful and iniquitous conduct of his persecutors: and this encourages his hope and prayer for deliverance.—“All thy commandments are truth.”

V. 87. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 88. ‘Preserve my life, raise me from this death-like condition, animate me by thy grace; that I may keep thy testimonies.’

V. 89, 90. Or, ‘Thou art for ever, O LORD, thy word, &c.’ The word of God is as unchangeable and everlasting as his own existence. It is established in the heavens, beyond the reach of the revolutions of this lower world; and its accomplishment is as certain, as the motions of the heavenly bodies, which are not at all affected by the convulsions and vicissitudes of the earth and its inhabitants.

V. 91. The heavens, and earth, and all the hosts of them, still keep their stations or perform their courses according to the original appointment of the Creator: and shall man, who alone is endued with reason and formed for immortality, be single in rebellion against him?

V. 92. David delighted to study the word of God: he took pleasure in the truths, promises, and precepts contained in it: and thus he was preserved from sinking under the weight of his troubles. He was directed how to act in the most difficult circumstances, and escape the destructive machinations of his enemies; and he derived encouragement from the most afflictive situations.

Vol. II.—No. 15.

V. 93. The benefit that the Psalmist had often derived from the precepts of the sacred word, by means of which he had been made alive to God, and animated in his service, so greatly endeared them to him, that having hid them in his heart, he was persuaded he should never forget them.

V. 94. ‘He proveth by effect, that he is God’s child; because he seeketh to understand his word.’ ‘Let it be remembered, that no man can say to God, with a good conscience, “I am thine;” unless he can also go on and say, “I have sought thy precepts.” Since, after all, his servants we are to whom we obey; and if sin be our master, how can we say to a Master whose interest is directly opposite, “I am thine?”’ (Horne.)

V. 95. Amidst the virulent persecution of the wicked, the Psalmist considered the testimonies of God, or his truths and promises; till his fears were allayed, and his heart was established in confidence and obedience.

V. 96. David in his time had seen Goliath the strongest overcome, Asahel the swiftest overtaken, Ahithophel the wisest befooled, and Absalom the fairest deformed. (Henry.) He had seen the vanity of all created good; the vexation of that estate which men account the summit of earthly bliss; the imperfection of the most accomplished human characters; the wretched close of the most prosperous lives; and the miserable disappointment of those who trusted in men, or idolized earthly possessions and enjoyments. The more he was acquainted with men and worldly things, the more he was convinced, that the former were imperfect at best, and the latter wholly insufficient to make him happy: but the fuller knowledge he attained of the sacred Scriptures, the more excellent, extensive, and perfect they appeared; a perfect rule for his conduct and ground for his hope, a guide to happiness, and a source of present comfort. Or, the more fully he understood the extent, spirituality, and excellence of the divine law; the more clearly he discerned the imperfection of all human obedience: “by the law is the knowledge of sin;” the breadth of the commandment

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, on JOD, CAPH, and LAMED.

As the Lord hath made us and fashioned us capable, by the faculties of our rational souls, of knowing, loving, worshipping, and enjoying him ; as we are now rendered incapable, by the blindness of our understandings and the depravity of our hearts, of this employment and felicity ; and as the Gospel opens a way for our recovery to the image of God, and the capacity of his service and favour : so we ought continually to beseech him by his Holy Spirit, to give us understanding, that we may learn and do his will ; and our prayers will be prevalent, when they spring from a humble desire of being enabled by his grace to answer the end of our creation and redemption. They who fear and serve God love to associate together, and to converse concerning their common faith and hope in his word : but they are especially rejoiced, when they see such as have trusted in the promises of God under very severe trials, and have been delivered ; because this relieves them also from their fears and encourages their hopes. It is easy to acknowledge that all the judgments of God are right, with reference to others : but to be fully assured of this truth, when his afflicting hand lieth heavy on us ; and to allow his wisdom, justice, goodness, and faithfulness, under our acutest sufferings, is no common attainment even among true believers : and as far as this assurance prevails, we shall be cured of our murmurs, and rendered thankful and submissive under every trial. It is, however, evident, not only that God is faithful and merciful, though he afflict his people : but that he afflicts them in faithfulness and mercy : such loving corrections are promised in his covenant, and without them we should be ruined. But whilst we are taking these needful but unpleasant medicines, we may beg of the Lord that his merciful kindness may be for our comfort : and faith, patience, and prayer will surely make way for the consolations of the Holy Spirit. For the abundant mercies and tender compassions of our Father come to all who trust in him and delight in his law : and they shall neither sink in trouble, nor be finally baffled by temptation ; for as their Redeemer liveth, they shall live also, even for ever and ever. The pride and blasphemy, the perverseness, iniquity, oppression, and deceit of the enemies of God, are certain fore-runners of their confusion and destruction : and whilst his servants meditate on his testimonies, they may despise the boastings, menaces, and insults of those who hate them for righteousness' sake. Indeed it is best, in such circumstances, to live retired, and to commune with our God, our Bibles, and our own hearts ; lest we be engaged in contentions, which produce only sin and sorrow. But when they who fear God, and have known his righteous testimonies, imbibe jealousies and prejudices, and become reserved, or opposers of us, the trial is very heavy. We ought, however, to examine our conduct, and be humbled for those sins and indiscretions which have occasioned this unfavourable judgment of us : and we should then apply to him who hath all hearts in his hand, beseeching him to turn them unto us, that they may counsel and comfort us in our difficulties. Above all, we should pray for a sound heart in God's statutes : and then all aspersions or suspicious appearances will vanish in due time, and our disgrace will terminate in honour, either here or in a better world. But shame will be the lot of unsound professors, more than of any other workers of iniquity. Happy are they who long for the salvation of God, and hope in his word, waiting for the performance of his promises, in attendance on his ordinances, and obedience to his precepts. Their intense desires and sharp trials may make their souls ready to faint ; and delays may cause their eyes to fail, whilst they are saying, "Wilt thou comfort me ?" Afflictions, slanders, infirmities, and persecutions, may render them despised, and thrown aside as a broken vessel, or a bottle in the smoke : but as they do not forget God's statutes, he will not be regardless of their distresses. The days of their mourning shall be ended : though they appear tedious, they are but for a moment compared with that eternal felicity which they are working out for them : and at length vengeance will be executed on all who harassed and tried to ensnare them, in defiance of the authority and law of God. The commandments are true and faithful guides in that path of peace and safety which the testimony of God reveals, and his promise secures to every believer. Nature is most disquieted by suffering wrongfully : but faith and grace are encouraged by that very consideration ; for we cannot so confidently expect help from God, when we suffer as evil-doers, as when, like our Master, we do well and suffer for it. Wicked men may almost consume the believer on earth ; but as neither fear, nor dejection under sufferings, induces him to forsake the divine precepts, so the Lord will support him in obeying them, and deliver him out of all his troubles : and should men prevail to kill the body, they will only liberate the soul, and hasten its entrance on unsullied joys. We should therefore seek in the first place to be invigorated and animated by the loving-kindness of the Lord, to hold fast his truth, and adhere to his precepts ; and then we may cheerfully leave all our concerns in his hands. For the engagements of his covenant are established on a firmer basis than the earth itself : his faithfulness remaineth to all generations, and to eternity : and all the hosts of heaven, in serving the Lord and doing his will, concur in accomplishing his promises to his people. May we have grace, in our respective places, to do his will in like manner : then we may be sure that we shall not perish in our afflictions, and every recollection of his precepts will animate our hopes, and enliven our affections ; as by them the Lord at first quickened us, when we were dead in sin. Thus shall we know that we are the Lord's, by his choice and purchase of us, and by our choice of him and devotedness to him: and seeking to know and do his precepts, and considering his testimonies, we may be sure of his salvation, however the wicked wait for us to destroy us. In fine, the enlarged knowledge of the word of God, in its length and breadth, will spoil our relish for the pleasures of sin, lessen our value of all earthly good, and take us off from all confidence in man, or in our own wisdom, strength, and righteousness. Thus we shall be led to seek our comfort and felicity from God alone; and to receive Christ Jesus as our "wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption." Being thus interested in his perfect obedience, we shall learn to copy his perfect example; and shall neither be satisfied with an imperfect holiness, nor with any portion that is not vast as our capacities and durable as our existence.

NOTES.

V. 97. 'He showeth that we cannot love God's word, except we exercise ourselves therein, and practise it.'

V. 98—100. 'The "commandments of God," were ever with David: the "testimonies" of God were his meditation; and "the precepts" of God it was his care to observe: therefore his wisdom exceeded the policy of his enemies, the learning of his teachers, and the experience of the ancients.' (Horne.) In David's circumstances, it was hardly possible that he should not be conscious of this; seeing every day's experience and observation confirmed it. In judging thus, he thought "soberly of himself, and as he ought to think;" unless he would "call good evil and evil good, and put light for darkness and darkness for light;" and he gave the whole honour of his proficiency to God, who had by his word given him this 'good understanding in the way of godliness.' It would not, however, be expedient for any man to speak thus of himself: except for some special purpose: but "the Spirit "of God spake" by the Psalmist, and it was proper that this commendation of the Scriptures should stand on record, for the honour of God, and the instruction of mankind in all subsequent generations.

V. 102. (Note 33.) 'Perseverance is the effect of instruction from above, by the spirit through the word: and our heavenly Teacher differeth from all others in this, that with the lesson, he bestoweth on the scholar

'both a disposition to learn, and an ability to perform.' (Horne.)

V. 103. 'The soul has its taste, as well as the body; and that taste is then in right order, when the words of Scripture are as sweet to the soul as honey is to the mouth. If they are not always so, it is because our taste is vitiated by the world and the flesh.' (Horne.)

V. 104. A full and clear knowledge of the precepts of the divine law, in their extent, spirituality, and excellence, is an introduction to a right understanding of the Gospel, and indeed of the whole Scripture; it is the best preservative from heresies and delusions, almost all of which may be traced to errors or ignorance in this respect: and where the heart as well as the mind has learned the precepts of God, a holy taste, as well as a sound judgment, will be the sure effect; and every false and evil way will be hated and shunned.

V. 105. 'The word of God discovereth to us our errors; it showeth us where we have lost our way, and how we may recover it again. If we take this lamp in our hand, it will not only point out our course in general, but also direct us in every step, and guide our feet into the way of peace and holiness.' (Horne.)—The metaphor is taken from a man walking on a dangerous road, in the dark, except as he sees by a lamp, or lantern, where to set his feet, step by step, as he proceeds; but taking heed to his way by his friendly light, he passes on safely and even comfortably, where otherwise he must have fallen into mischief or destruction. Such is this world and our passage through it; such is man without revelation, or with revelation and without faith; and such is the use faith makes of revelation.

V. 106. David had bound his soul with a most solemn vow, to live devoted to God and obedient to his commandments. The preventing grace of God had inclined his heart to this; he doubtless depended on his continued help for ability to perform his vow; and "the keeping of God's "righteous judgments," to which he thus bound himself, was that of a sinner under a dispensation of mercy, and of a believer who is interested in the covenant of grace. Such a solemn vow is implied in baptism, in bringing our children to be baptized, and in our attendance on the Lord's table; and these public solemnities should be preceded by those secret transactions betwixt God and our souls, in which we accept of his proffered benefits, and yield up ourselves to his service.

—* Heb do. — a 33, 34. 1 Pet. i. 13.

V. 108. Praise and thanksgiving, with other devotional exercises, are the free-will-offerings of the mouth, which are acceptable to God through the sacrifice and mediation of Christ: and David in his afflictions could present no other oblations.

V. 109. David's life was continually in danger, and he was required at all times to exert himself, and use the greatest precaution, in warding off the assaults of his persecutors; but he would not violate the law of God, even in order to self-preservation.

V. 111. By faith to receive the truths which God had attested, and to embrace the promises that he had given, and thus to walk with him in his commandments and ordinances, formed that life which David chose to lead on earth, as introductory to his everlasting heritage in heaven: and the rejoicing of his soul in the exercise of faith, hope, love, and other pious affections, here below, was an earnest and pledge of those unalloyed pleasures reserved for him in the future world.

V. 112. ° The inclination of the heart to good is the ° work of God: but man is nevertheless, in this as in other ° instances, said to perform it, when he listens to the call, ° and obeys the motions of His grace.—We are not to judge ° of ourselves by what we sometimes say and do: but by ° the general disposition and tendency of the heart and its ° affections.' (Horne.)

V. 113. The word vain is not in the original; and some render the verse, "I hate other thoughts; but thy ° law do I love." These thoughts, however, which the Psalmist hated, doubtless were vain or evil, and so, contrary to the law that he loved. ° Love and hatred are the ° two great and influencing affections of the human mind. ° Since the fall they have been misplaced. covetous, sensual, envious, or malicious imaginations occupy the minds of ungodly men, and often infect their very dreams. These are not only sinful in themselves, and evidential of the state of their hearts, and as such will be brought into the account at the day of judgment: but they excite the dormant corruptions, and lead to more open and gross violations of the holy law. The carnal mind welcomes and delights to dwell upon these congenial imaginations, and to solace itself by ideal indulgences, when opportunity of other gratification is not presented, or when it dares not venture on the actual transgression. But the spiritual mind recoils at them: such thoughts will intrude, but they are unwelcome and distressing, and are thrust out from time to time; whilst other subjects, from God's word, are stored up in readiness to occupy the mind more profitably and pleasantly, during the hours of leisure and retirement. And there is no better test of our true character, than the habitual effect of vain thoughts upon our minds; whether we love and indulge them, or abhor and watch against them. And by inquiring, to what subjects we habitually and allowedly revert, when present circumstances do not impose any one upon us, we may discover the prevalent disposition of our heart, whether we be carnal or spiritual; and may also learn whether pride, malice, avarice, ambition, or sensuality be the predominant corruption in our souls.

ciency in worldly wisdom, their deep laid stratagems, and all their crooked politics, at length disappoint their expectations, and leave them to hopeless contempt and misery.

V. 119. 'Ungodly men and hypocrites are mingled among the servants of God, as dross is blended with the pure metal; but the fiery trial of divine judgments discovereth the difference.' 'These dispensations increase our love of God's word; because they give us sensible experience of its truth.' (Horne.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, on MEM, NUN, and SAMECH.

When grace is in lively exercise, the thirst and relish for "the sincere milk of the word" of God, become exceedingly strong, and show themselves by a daily and constant meditation on it, in all the intervals of needful business and conversation: and if the Lord has thus disposed our souls to love, study, and keep his truths, testimonies, and precepts, he will give us true wisdom. The diligent believer will after a time "have the word of Christ dwelling richly and abundantly" in his memory, judgment, and affections; and having it ever with him, he will be wiser than his most sagacious enemies; and able to discern, escape, or profit by, all their machinations, and even to baffle every temptation of his most subtle adversary the devil. Nay, the simplest Christian, who by faith and prayer appropriates the information conveyed to him in the Scriptures of truth, will soon surpass, in useful knowledge and practical wisdom, the most learned teachers, the most renowned fathers, and the most aged and experienced persons, who, "leaning to their own understandings," reject or are but superficially acquainted with, the Oracles of God; for these are far surer guides to truth, than doctors, councils, or synods, ancient or modern. It will not indeed readily occur to the mind of a humble Christian, that he is thus wiser than his seniors and superiors; and he will suspect and fear the thought, when it presents itself: yet, daily reading his Bible, he must perceive how men deviate from that unerring standard of truth and wisdom, and run into error and delusion; he cannot, without ingratitude, deny what the Lord hath taught him; nor dares he, in an affected and voluntary humility, call darkness light, and light darkness, or prefer human conjectures to the decisions of the only wise God. But, "who is a wise man, and endued with knowledge among us? Let him show out of a good conversation his works with meekness of wisdom." If the Lord hath indeed taught us, we "restrain our feet from every evil way, that we may keep his word;" nor shall we depart from his judgments all our days. Our souls relish the words of God more than the mouth doth the sweetness of honey; and in proportion as, through his precepts, we get understanding, we shall hate and shun every way of sin and of hypocrisy. We do not use our knowledge ostentatiously, and to gain applause; but knowing what a dark and perilous path we tread, and how important each of our steps is to ourselves and to others, we use the word of God as a lamp, which we carry in our hands, that we may not stumble, be ensnared, or defiled; and that we may not only not quite miss our way, but that we may proceed uniformly with credit and comfort. Depending on the promised grace of God, the true Christian solemnly vows to keep his righteous judgments, and he determines to perform his vows. He is often greatly afflicted, but it chiefly grieves him that "he cannot do the things that he would;" and his longing desire to become more holy dictates his daily prayers for quickening grace. He offers the free-will-offerings of his mouth, his grateful praises for former mercies, united with supplications for further instruction and assistance; and he depends only on mercy for the acceptance of his defective and defiled services. If we are indeed thus "led by the Spirit," neither enemies nor dangers will induce us to forget the law of our God, or to wander from his precepts: but we shall choose his testimonies as our eternal heritage, and find his service our present rejoicing, even in the midst of tribulation and persecution; and we shall bestow pains, as well as pray, that our hearts may be inclined to perform God's statutes always even unto the end. In proportion as we are thus spiritually-minded, we shall hate all sinful thoughts, and delight in heavenly meditations; and shall flee to the Lord as our Hiding-place and Shield, from the incursions of vain imaginations, and satanical suggestions, as much as for protection from outward violence, hoping in his word for deliverance from them all. Would we make progress in thus keeping God's commandments, we must separate from evil-doers, and even drive them from our company, if they will intrude; unless we mean to sacrifice conscience to courtesy, which king David would not do. We must also rely entirely on the upholding of divine grace; or we shall never be safe, or able to have continual respect to all the Lord's statutes: but in this simplicity of intention and dependence, we shall be held up and live, and never be ashamed of our hope. Every affection of the soul must be engaged in keeping us steadfast in the ways of God. We must be allured by hope, and constrained by love, and even moved by fear. And it will be profitable for us often and seriously to consider the contempt and misery which are poured upon the wicked, and prepared for them; for assuredly they will be trodden down like mire, and put away like dross, or driven like chaff into unquenchable fire: and these reflections, on the doom of hypocrites and apostates, will induce us to cleave more steadily in love to God's testimonies. But if such subjects made David to exclaim, "My flesh trembleth for fear of thee, and I am afraid of thy judgments:" surely we, who fall so far below him in devout affections, should "fear, lest a promise being left us of entering into heavenly rest, any of us should be found to come short of it!"

NOTES.

V. 121, 122. Conscious of having adhered to justice and equity, even towards his persecutors, the Psalmist appeals to God from their unrighteous decisions: and he prays, that he may not be left in the hands of his proud oppressors; but that the Lord himself would become his Surety. 'Put thyself between mine enemies and me, as if thou wert my pledge.' As a rich person, by becoming surety for a poor man, rescues him from oppression or imprisonment: so the Lord delivers his servants from their enemies, and from impending ruin, by undertaking their cause. Christ our Surety, having paid our debt and ransom, rescues us from merited condemnation, and engages for all the blessings of complete salvation to every true believer.

V. 123. (Note, 82.) "Thy just promise." (Old Version.) 'The word, which hath promised it,' (salvation) 'is the word of truth, faithfulness, and righteousness; the attributes of God are engaged for its accomplishment,' and "He cannot deny himself." (Horne.) The justice of God, in deciding between David and his unjust oppressors, according to his word, might also be intended. (Notes, 2 Thes. i. 3-10.)

V. 125. 'I am devoted to thy service, and designed by thee to a high employment; enlighten my understanding, therefore, that I may fully know my duty.' (Bp. Patrick.) These repeated petitions no doubt were recollected by Solomon, when he prayed to the same effect. (Notes, 1 Kings iii. 5-14.)

V. 126. They make void the law of God, who deny its obligation and authority, who obscure or explain away its meaning, and who render it of none effect by their traditions, or by their lives. When these evils become general, it is time for the Lord to take the matter in hand, and by his own power to silence infidels, profligates, pharisees, and antinomians; to stand up for the honour of his own word, and to maintain his own cause among men: for no other power can effect these purposes; and in such circumstances the whole honour will be given unto him. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 127. 'As the wickedness of those increaseth, who "make void the divine law;" the zeal and love of believers should increase in proportion, to stem the torrent: and this may be done, to a surprising degree, by a

'few persons who, after the example of the first Christians, can forsake all to follow their Master; who have the sense and the courage to prefer truth, wisdom, holiness and heaven, to falsehood, folly, sin, and the world; who can resolutely reject the glittering temptation, and say without hypocrisy to their God, "I love thy commandments above gold, yea, above fine gold." (Horne.)

V. 128. 'The more I consider them, the more I approve every one of them,—and abhor all those base and dishonest ways, whereby others advance themselves to riches and honours.' (Bp. Patrick.) The word here rendered false, is the same which before is translated, of lying, (29.) The word for way is indeed different; but the false way, in this verse, and the way of lying, in the other, no doubt are entirely the same.

V. 129. The discoveries which the word of God makes of the mysteries of his nature, the perfections of his character, and the power of his works, and likewise of the invisible and eternal world, are suited to excite the highest wonder and astonishment. The harmony of the divine attributes in the mystery of redemption; the way of a sinner's acceptance, and the method of giving peace to his conscience, without giving the least encouragement to sin; the rule and example of obedience, and all the motives and obligations to it, are most worthy of our admiration, love, and gratitude; and it is owing entirely, either to the depravity of our hearts, or to the familiarity of our thoughts with these subjects, that we are no more affected by them.

V. 130. The words of God enter the soul when, being read, or heard, they are understood, believed, stored up in the memory, and used to regulate the judgment and conduct. They then give a satisfactory light to the mind upon every subject that they treat of; and speedily communicate more useful knowledge upon the most important topics, to the simplest believer, than the acutest philosophers have been able to develope through successive generations. 'The simple idiots, that submit themselves to God, have their eyes opened, and their minds illuminated, so soon as they begin to read God's word.'—'Thus will the Scriptures give to the simple, in a few days, an understanding in those matters, which philosophers for centuries sought in vain.' 135 ^x Make thy face to shine upon thy servant: ^y and teach me thy statutes.

136 ^z Rivers of waters run down mine eyes; because they keep not thy law.

V. 131. As the man who has run himself out of breath opens his mouth to draw in the refreshing breeze, and eagerly pants for it: so the believer, wearied with the cares of life and his conflict with sin, longs for the consolations conveyed to him by the sacred word, and stands expecting and prepared to receive them into his heart.

V. 132. The love of the name or perfections of God, distinguishes the believer from all those who are carnally minded and enmity to God; for nothing availeth but faith, in Christ, "which worketh by love." The reconciled believer is dealt with according to the Gospel of grace; the unregenerate and unbelieving according to the strict and holy law. This David understood, and prayed earnestly to be dealt with, according to that gracious rule by which the Lord pardoned and recompensed his friends; not in that strict justice with which he punishes his enemies.

V. 133. The frequent ejaculatory prayers for divine teaching, upholding, &c. show how much the Psalmist understood and felt his entire dependence on God, not only for providential protection and the forgiveness of his sins: but also as to those things in which men in general depend on themselves, and assume the credit of any real or supposed difference subsisting between them and others: namely, the due exercise of their rational powers, and the right state of their hearts. "O God, from whom all holy desires, all good counsels, and all just works, do proceed, &c." (Liturgy.) It is evident that David deeply felt that iniquity in one form or other would enslave him; unless God himself ordered and upheld his goings, according to the sacred word.

V. 136. Conformity to Christ is the standard of the believer's growth in grace. David had "that mind in him" which was also in Jesus Christ: his grief was therefore intense, and his tears flowed as rivers down his furrowed cheeks, when he looked around, and saw multitudes ruining themselves and others, as well as dishonouring God, by impenitently despising and violating his holy law. 'children slain before his face, at the command of the 'bloody tyrant and usurper, Phocas, himself expecting 'the next stroke,—exclaimed aloud, in the words of David, "Righteous art thou, O LORD, and upright are thy judgments." (Horne.) This story is a good exposition of the verse; and if satisfactorily authenticated, would be a most admirable exemplification of the genuine tendency of the doctrine contained in it: namely, confidence in God, and acquiescence in his will, under the severest calamities.

V. 138. 'Thou hast commanded justice by thy testimonies, and truth especially.' (Old Version.) This translation seems literal. The law commands perfect righteousness; and even the Gospel requires truth in the inward parts.

V. 139. The Psalmist's ardent love to the word, and zeal for the glory of God, threw his mind into a most distressing commotion, whilst he observed how his enemies forgot and neglected the most obvious truths and precepts of Scripture. His spirit was stirred within him: and he became even sick with uneasiness; whilst he found himself unable to stop the progress of their impiety and rebellion. In this he may be considered as the type of the Saviour. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 140. 'Gold hath need to be refined; but thy word 'is purity itself.'—The figurative term, used in the original, denotes the purity of the sacred Scriptures; which reflect the holiness of the Lord's character and government, and require of us, and lead us to, purity of heart and life. This purity of the Scriptures the carnal mind dislikes, but the spiritually minded love and relish it; and they perceive it equally in the righteous precepts, as in the faithful promises, and therefore they love the whole word of God.

V. 142. 'Men may decree wickedness by a law, or 'they may change their decrees, and with them, what was 'right to-day may be wrong to-morrow: but the law of 'God is righteousness and truth to day and for ever.' (Horne.) Perhaps the everlasting righteousness of God as a Saviour, which "is unto and upon all that believe," is intended; and not merely his righteousness as a Judge.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, on AIN, PE, and TZADDI.

Happy is the man who, from evangelical principles, doeth judgment and justice to all around him: he will have rejoicing in the testimony of his conscience, and confidence in the mercy and truth of his God, in the midst of slander and persecution: the Lord will be his Surety for good, and will not leave him in the hand of any proud oppressor. Delays may try his patience, whilst he waits for the salvation of God, and the performance of his faithful and righteous word: but in due time the Lord will do justice betwixt him and his enemies, and answer his largest expectations.—If we are indeed become the servants of God, whether in a low or in a lofty station; he will deal with us according to his mercy: and if we desire to know his will and our proper work, he will give us understanding that we may learn his testimonies. In proportion as we love his service and value his commandments, we shall be grieved to witness the neglect and contempt with which they are treated: we shall be sensible that we cannot stop the progress of infidelity and immorality, or of those "damnable heresies," which make void the holy law of God; and this will excite our prayers to him, to arise and work, and cause iniquity to stop its mouth.—If we can say, that "we love God's commandments more than much fine gold;" if we really value the comforts and the cause of true godliness more than our worldly interests; and our love to the word of God gathers strength in proportion as we see others despise and trample upon it: we may hope to do something effectual, as instruments, by our example, prayers, influence, and talents, to stem the torrent of impiety. For we shall then venture the loss of every earthly advantage, and submit to any self-denial and suffering, in this important cause; and shall be as zealous and active in extolling and establishing, as wicked men are in decrying and vilifying, the truths and statutes of the Lord. But they who spiritually love any of his precepts, love them all, and esteem them all to be right: and they who hate any false way, hate them all, as dishonourable to God and ruinous to man. Increasing illumination, and closer meditation on divine subjects enhance the Christian's admiration and gratitude: and the wonders of redeeming love, which angels desire to look into, will fix the heart in the observance and adoration of them. When we simply receive the testimony of revelation by faith, with a due preparation of the heart, a new light pervades the understanding, and every object assumes another appearance: every view of spiritual things, in their glory and excellency, excites more ardent desires of clearer discoveries: nor can the longing, panting, thirsting, of the heaven-born soul, for more perfect knowledge and holiness, be ever satisfied till it arrives in the world above. To hunger and thirst after righteousness may here create uneasiness: but these desires shall be fully answered, when all of a contrary nature shall be eternally disappointed. The Lord regardeth with tender and fatherly mercy those who love his name: and if we cannot decide that we are of this happy number, we yet may pray unto him and say, "Look thou upon me, and be merciful unto me, as thou usest to do unto those that love thy name." And this will be done with more encouragement, if we can sincerely add our petitions, that he would "order our steps according to his word, and not let any iniquity have dominion over us." When it is our aim and desire thus "to keep the Lord's precepts," he will deliver us from oppression or comfort us under it, by his presence and the light of his countenance; and will teach us more and more of his holy truth and will. But though exempted from sorrow on our own account, we must expect to be grieved for others, whilst in this vale of tears; nor can we do other than mourn to behold our fellow-creatures hurry by troops unto destruction, without our being able to prevent it. It behooves us, however, to submit to the justice of God in this, as well as in other matters; this will calm the tempest of our souls; and we shall allow his judgments to be righteous in the destruction of the wicked, though nearly connected with us, as well as in our own afflictions; and shall be induced to cheerful obedience and a firm reliance on his faithful promises. When our zeal is purified from bitterness and resentment against ungodly opposers; when it runs in the same channel with that of the Redeemer; and when it makes us willing to renounce, venture, and suffer for the benefit even of our persecutors, it is good evidence that we are true Christians, and it will be very useful to others also. Happy are they who love the whole word of God, because of its purity, and its purifying influence on their hearts; for this no unregenerate person can do. They who are noble in this world, if strong in the grace of God, will be mean in their own eyes, and willing to be despised by others: and they that are poor and low in the world, will be great in the sight of God, if neither fear, shame, nor covetousness, render them forgetful of his precepts. These are of immutable and everlasting excellence and obligation. The law of God is the truth, the standard of holiness, and the rule of happiness. Yet the divine obedience of Christ alone forms that everlasting righteousness which is testified to us in Scripture, and justifies the believing sinner. But they who are thus justified, learn to delight in God's commandments, and to copy that obedience by which they are accepted: the trouble and anguish which took hold on their consciences, end in sweet peace and confidence: they enter on a new state, bear a new character, and lead a new life. They are comforted under future trials, and at length are brought forth out of them all. May the Lord give us understanding, that we may see and walk in this way of peace and salvation; that we may here live the life of faith and grace, and at length be removed to the life of glory, vision, and fruition.

NOTES.

V. 145, 146. 'He showeth, that all his affections and ' whole heart were bent to God's word, for to have help in ' his dangers.'—The Psalmist is also at least as earnest to be enabled to keep the commandments of God, as to be rescued from his sufferings.

V. 147, 148. 'David delighted in prayer and meditation; therefore he was beforehand with the light itself;
' therefore his eyes prevented the watches, that is, the last
' of those watches into which the night was by the Jews ' divided. He needed not the watchman's call, but was ' stirring before it could be given. Climate and constitu' tion will doubtless make a difference.—But by Christians
' who enjoy their health,—the sun should not be suffered
' to shine in vain, &c.' (Horne.) (Mark i. 35.)

V. 150, 151. 'If our enemies draw nigh to destroy ' us, God is still nearer to preserve us.' (Horne.)—He is indeed near, in his Providence, but we should, with David, pray that he may be graciously near us, to uphold our goings in his commandments, which are truth and righteousness; as well as to protect us against those that "follow
" after mischief and forsake his law."

V. 152. 'This hath been my support, long before I ' fell into these troubles, that whatsoever thou hast testi' fied to be thy will and pleasure is sure and steadfast, and ' shall never fail those that depend upon it.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 154. The original word, translated deliver, is taken from the office of a Redeemer, or next of kin among the Israelites, to whom it belonged to redeem the inheritance, or ransom the person of his impoverished or enslaved relative; and also to be his patron and defender against injustice and oppression; and the avenger of his blood, if he were slain.

V. 155. "The salvation of God is nigh them that fear
" him;" for they seek to know and do the will of God;
but, after all that hath been done by the great Redeemer, or revealed and promised in Scripture, or vouchsafed by a kind providence as 'means of grace;' yet, "salvation is " far from the wicked," or impenitent, "for they seek " not the statutes" of God.—Some explain the verse of temporal deliverance; 'Far be it from thee to afford any ' help to the wicked: for they have no regard to thy sta' tutes; but only seek how they may satisfy their own
' lewd and cruel desires.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 157, 158. 'Persecution tempteth men to apostacy,
' and is the great trial of our fidelity to God and to his ' word. He who in such circumstances forgetteth his own ' sufferings, to commiserate the sin and folly of his perse' cutors, is a true follower of Jesus Christ.' (Horne.)—The original word, denotes disgust as well as sorrow. Thus our Lord looked round on the Pharisees "with anger, be" ing grieved for the hardness of their hearts."

V. 159. The frequent though varied repetition of the ejaculatory prayer, "Quicken me, according to thy word," &c. shows that the Psalmist considered it as relating to objects of the highest importance. (Note 25.) The preservation of his temporal life, deliverance from his deep distresses, the communication of spiritual, and preservation to eternal, life; with animating, encouraging grace, and whatever was needful in order to his activity and vigour in obeying the commandments of God, amidst temptations, dangers, and sufferings, may be all considered as implied in the general terms; and sometimes one, sometimes another, to have been especially intended, according to existing circumstances.

V. 160. "The beginning of thy word is truth," &c.
The first promise to fallen Adam of a Redeemer; or the first promise to Abraham concerning his posterity, was truth itself. All the righteous judgments of God, whether in the declarations of his word, or in the dispensations of his providence, concur in accomplishing that truth, and form a part of that great design, which shall surely be completed and endure for ever. 'Since thou first pro-misedst, even to the end, all thy sayings are true.'

V. 161. Saul and his princes persecuted David most unjustly : but he so revered the word of God, that he would not retaliate, or avenge himself upon them ; and thus he constrained Saul himself to say, "Thou art more righteous than I."

V. 162. 'I take far more delight in doing thy will, and in what thou hast promised to do for me, than in the completest victory over all my enemies.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 163. (Notes 29, 30.)

V. 164. 'That is, sundry times.'—'They who, like David, during a time of persecution, put their trust in God, and wait his decision of their cause, will always find reason to praise him seven times a day, or continually, for his just decrees, and "righteous judgments," concerning them.' (Horne.)

V. 165. 'Amidst the storms and tempests of the world, there is a perfect calm in the breasts of those who not only do the will of God, but love to do it. They are at peace with God, by the blood of reconciliation ; at peace with themselves by the answer of a good conscience, and the subjection of those desires which war against the soul ; at peace with all men, by the spirit of charity ; and the whole creation is so at peace with them, that "all things work together for their good." No external troubles can rob them of this great peace ; no offences or stumbling-blocks, which are thrown in their way, by persecution or temptation, by the malice of enemies, or apostacy of friends, by any thing thy see, hear of, or feel, can detain, or divert them from their course.' Heavenly love surmounts every obstacle, and runs with delight the way of God's commandments.

(Horne.) This beautiful note seems indeed rather to show what would be the case, did we perfectly love the law of God ; and were indwelling sin not only dethroned, but destroyed, than what is generally, or perhaps in any instance, attained in this world. But love to the law of God is a sure proof of conversion, and is in ordinary cases attended by proportionable peace ; all disturbance and disquietude arise from contrary sources ; and all who love the law, shall be "kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation." Other professed Christians may be offended and fall away, but these never shall.

V. 166. 'He showeth that we must first have faith, before we can work and please God.' To hope, on Scriptural grounds, for the salvation of God, and in this hope to obey his commandments, unreservedly and habitually, forms a sure pledge of eternal felicity, and a constant preparation for death and judgment.

V. 167, 168. 'The plea of having kept the divine precepts, in the mouth of David, or any other believer, intendeth sincerity, not perfection, and is alleged as an evidence of grace, not as a claim of merit.' (Horne.)

All, &c. 'I have no respect unto men, but see thee always before my eyes, as the Judge of my actions.'

V. 169. Give, &c. This may mean, not only that God has promised in his word to give wisdom to those who ask him for it ; but also, that understanding, or wisdom, consists in having the mind enlightened and the judgment formed according to the truths and precepts of Scripture ; which is the medium through which God gives (and man must seek,) true knowledge and wisdom ; and the standard by which he judges of them, and distinguishes the genuine from all counterfeits.

V. 171. 'The word signifieth to pour forth continually.' "My lips shall pour forth praise ; for thou hast taught me thy statutes." This is more literal, and accords better to the context ; the same particle is rendered for in the next verse.

V. 175. Let thy, &c. Or, "Thy judgments shall help me." The judgments of God on his enemies, the fatherly corrections of his people, the counsels of his word, and the ordinances of his house, are all helpful to the believer's sanctification, through the influences of the Holy Spirit.

V. 176. 'It is doubtful, whether David here speaks of his misery or his sin, or his wandering as an exile,—or going astray from the commandments of his God.' (Horne.) The simile, however, of a lost sheep is so generally applied to the latter case, and the language, thus interpreted, accords so to other parts of Scripture, that it is most probable his past sins, and his proneness to wander, were especially meant in this concluding confession and ejaculation. Perhaps it was written after he had gone so far astray in the matter of Bathsheba and Uriah; and being deeply convinced of his guilt and misery, he felt his need of the special aid of the good Shepherd, to bring him back to the fold of God. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, on KOPH, RESCH, SCHIN, and TAU.

Supplications with the whole heart differ very widely from that lip-labour in which formalists confide, and are presented by those alone who long for God's salvation, and who love his commandments, but who are sensible of their inability to keep them. Great earnestness in any undertaking often interrupts our sleep; thus fervent love to the word of God, and delight in communion with him, will render us willing to deduct from the hours of rest and refreshment, rather than be prevented from attending on these needful and pleasant exercises. Though the Lord hath not seen good to give us positive injunctions in these matters, and though he is accessible at all hours: yet we may often detect ourselves, as defective in love, gratitude, and spirituality, by our slothfulness and self-indulgence; seeing we have been needlessly asleep, or employed in trifles, when we might have been improving our privilege of access to the mercy-seat, and to that sacred word in which we profess to hope. This should lead us to call upon God to hear our voice, and quicken us, according to his love, his wisdom, and his truth. When employed in the service of God, we need not fear, though "they draw nigh that follow after mischief, and are far from his law," in their temper and conduct; for He is near to defend us, and will vindicate the honour of his commandments against those who hate us for obeying them: and if we have depended on his testimonies, our constant experience will assure us that he hath established them for ever. He considers the weight and the continuance of our afflictions, and will plead our cause and deliver us; as we do not forget his law, but are more desirous of being invigorated in his ways than of exemption from trouble. But present safety and everlasting salvation are far from the wicked who neither observe, nor understand, nor even seek after the truths and statutes of the Lord: and, alas, how numerous are these careless presumptuous transgressors! The number, power, and malice of our persecutors should enhance our value for the tender mercies of the Lord, and our steady purpose not to decline from his ways. And in this frame of mind we shall rather grieve for the transgressors who are ruining themselves, than for the uneasiness that they occasion us. Happy are they who can appeal to God how cordially they love his law: his grace hath planted this love in their hearts; they are interested in all his precious promises, which from the beginning have been true and faithful; and they are brought into the way of those righteous judgments, every one of which is immutable and endureth for ever. When princes become persecutors, their frowns and menaces prove powerful temptations to apostacy or iniquity: and desire of self-preservation may dictate very unwarrantable measures: but they whose "hearts stand in awe of God's word," will rather endure the wrath of man, than break the law of their almighty Judge, and will prefer suffering to deliverance by sin. Nay, were there no denunciations of wrath on those that draw back for fear of the cross; their value for the promised blessings and consolations of the Scripture is so great, that they would not renounce them to save their lives, and to obtain all worldly advantages: for they rejoice in digging into those rich mines of everlasting truth and love, far more than their enemies can do in spoiling them of their earthly substance. Our dread and detestation of hypocrisy, fraud, and dissimulation, will be proportioned to our love of the truth and law of God: they, therefore, who cheat or impose upon their neighbours for their own gain, cannot really love the Gospel. The mercies of common providence, the righteous judgments recorded in Scripture, and the blessings conveyed to us by them, demand our constant tribute of praise; and were our hearts like that of David, we should not be so remiss and infrequent in this heavenly exercise: nor would even troubles and persecutions unfit us for it; seeing we have so many unmerited comforts, such glorious discoveries made to us, and such blessed prospects set before us, in our most trying circumstances. The believer, delighting in the law of his reconciled God, enjoys great peace of conscience and tranquillity of mind, even in this turbulent and unsettled world; and the promises of God assure him, that he shall not meet with any stumbling-block, over which he shall fall to rise no more. He hopes for the free salvation of the Gospel, and conscientiously obeys the holy commandments of the law: he keeps the testimonies of God, yea, loves them exceedingly; and attends on his worship, as one who knows that all his ways are before His eyes. Yet he will not rest in present attainments: he continues to cry unto his God for further instruction and sanctification, and for deliverance from his sins. Expecting the answer of his prayers, he determines that his lips shall render praises to his God. He knows that all God's commandments are righteousness itself, and therefore he will speak of them to others; whilst he chooses them as the rule of his own conduct, and begs for help from the powerful hand of the Lord, that he may be enabled to obey them. He longs for more complete salvation, and delights in the service of God; and he would live on earth, and hopes to live in heaven for ever, that he may show forth his praises: He values even afflictions, when they help him in following after holiness. He often looks back with shame and gratitude to his original lost estate, when, like a helpless sheep, he wandered from the fold of God, and was sought and brought back by the good Shepherd. He humbly confesses his manifold subsequent wanderings; but as he hath not forgotten the commandments of God, he still prays to be sought out, and brought home, and kept safe under the watchful eye and tender care of the chief Shepherd, who "purchased his flock with his own blood;" that he may know his voice, and follow him, and receive from him the gift of eternal life. To close our meditations on this important psalm, let us examine our intentions, desires, fears, hopes, affections, experiences, and tempers by it; that we may judge ourselves, whether we be led by the Spirit of Christ or not, and that we may discover what progress we make in the divine life. Let us frequently step aside from a vain world, to view ourselves in this sacred mirror; that we may discover and rectify what is wrong in our tempers and conduct, and be directed in our confessions, our watchfulness, and our prayers by it: remembering always, that the more we advance in holiness, the more we shall anticipate the joys of heaven; and as it were breathe the pure air of those celestial regions, even while we continue in the noisome dungeon of this evil world.

NOTES.

PSALM CXX. Title. No satisfactory reason hath been assigned, why this and the fourteen following psalms are entitled Songs of Degrees. Some think that it denotes, that they were peculiarly suited to mount the soul from earth to heaven: but others suppose that this title only relates to the manner in which they were set to music, and sung at the temple. 'This psalm seems to have been made by David when the calumnies of Doeg and others forced him to flee his country.' (Bp. Patrick.)

from this lying and slandering? What fruit had ye in those things, of which ye are now ashamed?"

V. 4. Coals of. The intenseness and duration of the misery of those who slandered the servants of God, are represented by the vehement and lasting heat which the wood of the juniper tree is said to yield, after it is reduced to charcoal; as well as by the sharp arrows of a mighty warrior, when he overtakes his enemy. Some, however, think, that the slandering tongue is described under these images. "It is as the coals of juniper, &c."

V. 5. Kedar. It is probable that David never actually resided in Mesech or Arabia; but the conduct of Saul, and Doeg, and the Ziphites, was so treacherous and impious, that he seemed to be situated among the wild Arabs who subsisted by war and violence. Some render the word Mesech, not as the name of a people, but adverbially—"Wo is me, that I sojourn so long in the tents of Kedar, &c." Thus our Lord says, "How long shall I be with you? How long shall I suffer you?"

V. 7. I am, &c. Or, "I peace." David, though valiant in war, yet loved peace, and was very desirous of it: but his wise and blameless conduct only served to excite still more the envy and enmity of Saul and his courtiers.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Whilst we look, not to David only, but to Jesus the Prince of peace, and see him surrounded by ensnaring cavillers, and calumniated by lying lips and deceitful tongues; whilst we consider how long the holy Saviour sojourned in this wicked world, as in Mesech and in the tents of Kedar: whilst we attend to his blameless useful life, and the great object of his coming into the world, namely, "to make" and give peace by the blood of his cross; and then view him hated, reviled, and persecuted even to death by the professed worshippers of God: we cannot marvel if the world hate and slander us too; we shall not court the friendship of those who would wage war with the Son of God himself, if he were on earth; and though uneasy, we ought not to murmur at being for a time constrained to dwell amidst the contentious and malicious. But let us follow David as he prefigured Christ: in our distress let us cry unto the Lord, and he will hear us; and deliver our persons and reputations from lying lips, and every deceitful tongue. Let us possess our souls in patience, and follow after peace and holiness, and strive to overcome evil with good. Then, after our weary pilgrimage expires, we shall enter a land of eternal harmony, purity, and tranquillity. And as we must foresee the dreadful misery of all impenitent slanderers and liars, in the everlasting fire of hell; let us in meekness warn them of their danger, "If peradventure God will give them repentance, to the acknowledging of the truth; and that they may recover themselves out of the snare of the Devil, who are taken captive by him at his will." (2 Tim. ii. 25, 26.)

NOTES.

PSALM CXXI. V. 1. Some read this as an interrogation, "Shall I lift up, &c.?" as if the Psalmist had inquired whether it became him, as a worshipper of God, to look up to those hills for help on which idolaters worshipped their idols? But the sentence as it stands in our version, may mean that he would look up to the hill of Zion, or Moriah, on which the tabernacle was placed, for help from that God whose glory appeared above the mercy seat. If David was the writer of this psalm, (as it is most probable) it must relate to other dangers and difficulties, and not to those of his persecutions by Saul; for the hill of Zion was not in Israel's possession, nor was the ark placed there till long after Saul's death. "Though I am driven, not only from my own palace, but from God's dwelling-place; yet my eyes shall ever be directed thitherward; from whence I expect a powerful aid, against those numerous enemies who are combined to destroy me." (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 3, 4. "Bishop Lowth supposeth the first two verses to be the language of David, when going out to war; and the answer of encouragement to be made by the high-priest from the holy place." (Horne.) If, however, the psalm was written when David was driven away from Zion by Absalom, this could not be so; yet it seems to have been composed in order to be sung responsively; and these verses form the response to the preceding avowal of confidence in God. "In him thou hast a Guardian, who is not like all others, liable to sleep or death.—The Eye of his Providence upon thee is always open."—"Behold He that keepeth Israel neither slumbereth nor sleepeth."

3 He ^a will not suffer thy foot to be moved: he that keepeth thee will not slumber.

V. 5—8. As the pillar of cloud and fire shaded Israel in the wilderness from the scorching noon-day sun, and from the chilling cold and unwholesome influences of the night, over which the moon presides: so the Lord shelters his people from every open assault, and every insidious attempt of persecutors, seducers, or the powers of darkness.

'Nor scorching sun, nor sickly moon,
'Shall have his leave to smite;
'He shields thy head from burning noon,
'From blasting damps at night.—
'He guards thy soul, he keeps thy breath,
'Where thickest dangers come;
'Go and return, secure from death,
'Till God shall call thee home.' (Watts.)

—'He sheweth that God's providence not only watches over his church in general; but also over every member of it.'

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

During the believer's wearisome pilgrimage and perilous warfare, he should constantly look unto him who bled on mount Calvary, and who now reigns upon the holy hill of Zion; in whom we have righteousness and strength, through whom we have access to the mercy-seat, and to JEHOVAH as our Father, and by whom we shall ere long be received into everlasting mansions. The Helper and Keeper of Israel is the almighty Creator of heaven and earth; and if he be for us, who can be against us? We should then inquire, whether we belong to this holy nation, this peculiar people? This being ascertained, we may dismiss our anxious cares and fears; or only be careful to use the appointed means, and be found in our proper work. The Lord will uphold our goings in his ways, that our footsteps slip not. He neither slumbereth nor sleepeth; he will keep his people night and day, in dangers, snares, temptations, and persecutions; from open and secret enemies: he will preserve them from all real evil, and make all seeming evil work together for their good: he will protect their lives, during the appointed period, and order all the circumstances of their departure: he will preserve their souls, and take care of them in going out and coming in; when present with their bodies, and when separated, and when again united to them, from this time forth for ever.

more. "Happy are the people that are in such a case; yea, "blessed are the people, who have, the Lord for their God."

NOTES.

PSALM CXXII. V. 1, 2. This psalm seems to have been written for the use of the Israelites, when they went up to Jerusalem to celebrate their sacred feasts, (after the ark was removed thither;) and to have communion with God and with their brethren. Their journey would often be inconvenient, wearisome, and expensive: but the holy joy and benefit, which thence accrued, would amply repay them. Jerusalem was typical both of the church of true believers, and of the heavenly state; and the solemnities of Israel were equivalent to our public ordinances, and, when attended on in faith and love, earnestness and foretastes of the worship and joy of heaven. It may be supposed, that the Psalmist rejoiced, not only in anticipating the pleasure of attending on the ordinances of God, but also in perceiving the people so generally and zealously disposed to the duties of religion.

V. 3—5. 'By the artificial joining and beauty of the 'houses, he meaneth the concord and love that were between 'the citizens.' Jerusalem was from this time the centre of the worship and government of Israel, and served as the bond of union among the tribes: and whilst that city remained compact and united, as their common head, they were safe and prosperous. The union also of the priesthood in Aaron's family with the kingdom in that of David, was very advantageous to their common interests civil and religious; when justice was administered according to the law of God, and regal authority protected and supported the worship of God at his temple. This typified the union of the priesthood and kingdom in the person of the Redeemer. David's sons were chief rulers, soon after the removal of the ark to mount Zion; (2 Sam. viii. 18.) so that the thrones of his family, as well as his own throne, were then established at Jerusalem.

V. 6. 'The members of the Israelitish church are 'exhorted to pray for its peace and welfare: what that 'church was, the Christian church militant on earth now 'is, and demandeth in like manner the prayers of all

'Christian people for its peace and welfare in a trouble- 'some world. Its increase here below is, in reality, the 'increase of the Jerusalem above, of which it is a part, 'and ought to be a resemblance.' (Horne.) 'Happy 'shall they be who, from regard to the religion and justice 'administered in thee, O beloved city, contribute their 'endeavours, as well as prayers, for thy safety and pros- 'perity.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 8, 9. The Psalmist concludes, by declaring his full purpose of using his authority and influence for the benefit of the holy city, from love to his brethren and his pious friends, but especially from love to God and his sacred service. Thus he gave all rulers, through succeeding generations, an example, in what manner to improve their talents, in promoting true religion among their subjects, without at all infringing on the rights of conscience.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The servants of God should exhort, and be glad to be exhorted, to attend on his ordinances. Indeed, they who love his name and seek his salvation, will rejoice when it is said unto them, "Let us go into the house of the LORD;" and the pleasure and profit, that they derive from the means of grace, will make them disregard inconvenience and fatigue in resorting thither. With what alacrity then should we think of going to the temple above, where our feet shall stand within the gates of the heavenly Jerusalem! and how cheerfully should we bear the cross, and welcome the stroke of death, in hopes of that immortal crown of glory!—Union and harmony are the ornament and stability of the church on earth: and if all the disciples of Christ were of one mind, and "kept the unity of the Spirit in the bond "of peace," their enemies would be deprived of their chief advantage against them. And if they were all more attentive to the commands, and submissive to the authority, of the Son of David, and referred their causes to his decision; they would be more like "the tribes of Israel," even the "tribes of the LORD, when they went up to the "testimony of Israel," the ark of the covenant, and the mercy-seat, "to give thanks unto the name of the Lord."

But Satan's maxim has always been, to divide that he might conquer: and few Christians have been sufficiently aware of his design. Let all then, who love the cause of pure religion, pray for the peace, in order to the prosperity, of the church. Let us consider every one, who bears the image and seeks the glory of the Redeemer, as our brother, our companion, our fellow traveller, and our fellow soldier: without greatly regarding unessential differences or secular distinctions. Let us seek the peace and comfort of every true believer, the union and harmony of Christians amongst themselves, the security of the church against the assaults and devices of the common enemy, and the prosperity of all, whether in palaces or cottages, who use their influence and abilities to promote the cause of Christ, from love to his name. Let us, from zeal for the honour of our God, and good will to all our brethren, and delight in the ordinances of his house, seek to do good to every part of his church, by our prayers and example, and by every means in our power: and whilst we lament the abuses and divisions which prevail in the church on earth, let us solace ourselves with a foresight of the perfect harmony and tranquillity of the church in heaven; for perfect "peace will" "for ever be within her walls, and prosperity within her "palaces."

NOTES.

PSALM CXXIII. V. 1. Some think that this psalm was composed for the use of the church, during the Babylonish captivity, or when persecuted by Antiochus Epiphanes; but others suppose it to have been written by Isaiah, on occasion of the scoffing boasts and menaces of Sennacherib and Rabshakeh; while others are of opinion that David wrote it during Absalom's rebellion.

V. 2. "Behold we wait on thee, submitting ourselves 'to this severe punishment, as poor slaves to the stroke of 'their offended master or mistress; and resolving to bear 'it patiently, till thou—in much pity remove it." (Bp. Patrick.)—The expectation of deliverance from God under the injuries of men, as faithful servants depend on their masters for redress and protection, seems also especially meant.

V. 3, 4. These verses represent the persons spoken of, as living on scorn and contempt, (even as a man lives on his daily provisions,) till they were satiated with them, and knew not how to endure any more; yet still exposed to the insulting scoffs and taunts of their prosperous and haughty oppressors: but in this extremity they humbly sought mercy from God, to pardon their sins, and to comfort them under the cruel treatment of their enemies; and they renounced all other hope of support and deliverance.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Our merciful God, from his throne in the heavens, that high, and holy, and glorious place, where he displays his more immediate presence, looks down to behold the affairs of men, and hears the prayers of his afflicted people; being able and ready to redress their grievances, whenever they look up to him for help and deliverance. If then we are become his servants by faith in Jesus Christ; if we rely on his mercy, observe his directions, and expect our recompense from him, and not from man: we may also confidently look to him as our Master, to provide for, comfort, and defend us; and he will certainly require it of all those who interrupt or injure us whilst employed in his work. Being thus observant of his hand, and waiting for his mercy; we need not be disconcerted if we meet with scorn and insults from the pampered worldling or the proud infidel, from the sensual, self-indulgent, and prosperous sons of rebellion and impiety. Indeed contempt is very hard to bear: but the servants of God should not complain, if they are treated as his beloved Son was; and they cannot be more filled than he was with "the scorning of those "that are at ease, and the contempt of the proud." Let us then, when ready to faint under this trial, look unto Jesus, copy his meekness and patience, and by faith and prayer cast ourselves upon the mercy of our God. Ere long the proud and luxurious scorner will be filled with his own devices; and the despised believer inherit the throne of glory.

NOTES.

PSALM CXXIV. V. 1—3. The title ascribes this psalm to David; so that, abiding by this authority, we must look for the occasion of it in the history of that prince; though it is not easy to determine the particular deliverance to which it refers;—it may be applied to any season of special danger or distress to the church, or believers, from which they have been beyond expectation rescued. Had Israel's Helper been any other than the almighty and everlasting God; their numerous, powerful, and furious enemies must at once have destroyed them; as a voracious beast or bird of prey, or sea-monster, swallows alive the helpless animal that falls in its way. Israel had no power to deliver himself; and all other help, but that of God, must have been ineffectual. This seems peculiarly suited to Hezekiah's deliverance from Sennacherib; to which some learned men, notwithstanding the title, suppose the psalm to refer. Indeed, it would equally suit Israel's deliverance from Pharaoh and his army.

V. 4—8. Overwhelming torrents, or the furious waves of the stormy sea; the voracious jaws of lions, tigers, or wolves: and the craft and skill of the fowler, in deceiving and ensnaring the poor unsuspecting bird, form three striking illustrations of the danger to which the people of God had been exposed from their fierce, violent, and deceitful enemies: yet God had wonderfully delivered them; and they were filled with admiring gratitude when they recollected the extreme danger to which they had been exposed, and found themselves brought into a secure and happy situation. And as God had helped them, they were determined to confide in future on his protection alone.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The church of God in every age hath been opposed by numbers of powerful, enraged, and cruel enemies: fierce persecutions, bloody wars and massacres, and wide-spreading destructive heresies, have alternately threatened to swallow her up; as the furious billows were ready to overwhelm the feeble bark in which Jesus was asleep. But notwithstanding the machinations of hell, in aid of the efforts of human malice and power, the despised cause of Christ still maintains its ground: the proud waters have not yet overwhelmed and swallowed her up. "Blessed be the LORD, who hath not given her up as a prey unto the teeth of her furious enemies." But recollecting her dangers and helplessness, well may she say, "If it had not been the LORD, who was on our side, we should have been swallowed up quick, when men," when the powers of darkness, "were so enraged at us." The believer also recollecting his perilous situation, previous to his conversion, and the surprising manner in which he hath been rescued, the dangers from which he hath narrowly escaped, and the difficulties from which he hath been extricated, notwithstanding his own ignorance, folly, and feebleness, will readily make the same thankful acknowledgment, and ascribe all the honour of his salvation to the power, mercy, and truth of Israel's God. He will consider himself as a shipwrecked mariner marvellously saved from the tumultuous waves, as a poor lamb snatched from the jaws of the greedy wolf, or as the helpless bird set at liberty from the fowler's snare, in which it had heedlessly got entangled. Ere long every true Christian, being finally delivered from troubles, enemies, sins, and dangers, will look back on the way in which the Lord hath led him with admiring gratitude; and celebrate his mercy and truth in eternal songs of praise. Let us then now begin to praise him for the past, "if indeed Satan's snare be broken, and we be delivered;" and let us rejoice that our help for the time to come, "is in the name of the LORD, who made heaven and earth."

NOTES.

PSALM CXXV. V. 1. It does not clearly appear on what occasion, or by whom, this psalm was written: some, however consider it as referring to the invasion of Judah by Sennacherib, and the miraculous deliverances granted to Jerusalem, in answer to the prayers of Hezekiah and Isaiah. —The security of the church implies the security of every true member of it.

V. 2. "Jerusalem! The mountains are round about her! And the LORD is round about his people from henceforth for evermore." This is a literal translation.

PSALM CXXVI.

The joyful surprise of the church when delivered from captivity, 1-3. A prayer for a more complete deliverance; with assurances of a happy event to all the sorrows of God's people, 4-6.

The surrounding mountains only seemed to render the holy city impregnable: but the power of the almighty God effectually secures his true people.

V. 3. The persecuting rage and power of the wicked fall upon the righteous, but they do not rest upon them, or prevent them from possessing and enjoying their allotted inheritance. They are permitted, moderated, and sanctified, for their trial, correction, and spiritual proficiency: but if augmented and continued according to the desire of their enemies, they might become a too powerful temptation, and at length induce them to put forth their hands unto iniquity. (Matt. xxiv. 21, 22. 1 Cor. x. 13.)

V. 4, 5. Uprightness before God, and kindness to men, characterize true believers, for whom the Psalmist here prays.—The way of holiness is straight; there are no windings or shiftings in it; it is a uniform course of piety, integrity, sincerity, and kindness. But the ways of sinners are crooked: they shift from one pursuit to another, and turn hither and thither to deceive; they wind about a thousand ways to conceal their base intentions, to accomplish their iniquitous projects, or to escape the punishment of their crimes: yet, disappointment, detection, confusion, and misery, are their inevitable portion.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The people of God trust in his mercy, truth, and power, and keep his commandments; they copy his example of goodness, and, with all their defects, are upright in their hearts. Their hopes and their souls are built upon that tried and precious Foundation, which God hath laid in Zion; on which the whole church is founded, and which "cannot be removed, but abideth for ever:" yea, the Lord himself is with them, and a protection round about them, "from henceforth even for ever." Their dread of sin and of apostacy, and their prayers to be kept from them, though by suffering or death, are the evidences that they shall not apostatize: for the Lord will proportion their strength to their trials, and make all things work together for their good; the malice and enmity of the wicked shall only prove a correcting rod, and not a destroying sword; and even this rod shall not rest upon them, lest they faint under the chastisement. And not only the prayers of their brethren, but the intercession of their Saviour, secure to them the upholding power and preserving grace of God. As to those who turn back unto their crooked ways, they never were true believers; and their apostacy is the detection of their hypocrisy. Their knowledge, conviction, and profession, will but enhance their condemnation, and "the LORD shall lead them forth with "evil-doers; but peace shall be upon" every Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile. LORD, number us with them, in time and to eternity!

NOTES.

PSALM CXXVI. V. 1-3. This psalm is generally thought to have been composed when the Jews were restored to their own land after the Babylonish captivity. Their restoration was effected in so sudden and extraordinary a manner, and was so delightful to them, that it seemed more like a pleasant dream than a reality. Even the heathen noted the hand of God in their deliverance, and allowed that he had done great things for them.—The whole event was typical of the spiritual redemption of the church, and of every believer, from the bondage of sin and Satan: and the word of God predicts a deliverance of the New Testament church from her long continued captivity, which will occasion still greater surprise and exultation.

V. 4. The torrents or brooks in the southern deserts run off, or dry up, in the summer-months; but after the periodical rains they return again, and the channels are filled for the refreshment of the thirsty traveller: thus the Jews who were settled in their own country, prayed that their brethren might be brought back to replenish the land, which had lain so many years desolate.

PSALM CXXVII.

Every labour is vain, without dependence on God's blessing, 1, 2. Children are gifts of God, and highly to be valued, 3-5.

*A Song of degrees * for Solomon.*

EXCEPT ^a the LORD ^c build the house, ^d they labour in vain that [†] build it: ^e except the LORD keep the city, ^f the watchman waketh but in vain.

2 It is vain for you to rise up early,

h Prov. xxxi. 15-18.

V. 5, 6. The tears, with which the poor captives at Babylon had accompanied their repentance and prayers; the grief, with which on their return they beheld, and attempted to repair, the desolations of their city and temple; and all the hardships, which they endured in that pious attempt, would surely issue in joy and praise. As the poor husbandman, who perhaps wants his seed-corn to feed his family, and cannot part with it and witness their hunger without tears, and who with great labour and anxiety sows his good seed; will in due time rejoice in reaping and conveying home a plenteous harvest. The same is applicable to all the sorrows of a true Christian.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The hand of God should be acknowledged in all our mercies, whoever be the instrument of them: and if unexpected deliverance from outward captivity be so valued and rejoiced in, how ought we to value redemption from the wrath to come, and from the power of sin and Satan! The poor trembling sinner, being deeply convinced of his guilt and danger, having long sought and waited, with discouragement, for peace and liberty: when by looking to a crucified Saviour, he is freed from his burden, and receives peace to his conscience, and power to break off his sins; reviews the misery he has escaped, the price and method of his rescue, and the prospects which open to him, and can often scarcely believe his happiness a reality. The phantoms of a dream, or the sportive illusions of the waking imagination, could never present to his mind aught so welcome, as he now by faith perceives, and by grace experiences. Thus "is his mouth filled with laughter, and his tongue with singing:" and if his future conduct correspond to this happy beginning, even the ungodly will be constrained to own, that "The LORD hath done great things for him." With what exultation then will the redeemed sinner rejoin, "The LORD hath done great things for me, whereof I am glad!" Yet still he hath to struggle with many temptations, corruptions, and afflictions: he will seek, and not in vain, for renewed and more complete deliverance; he will often on earth renew his songs of grateful praise; but, when at last redeemed from death, he shall stand complete before the throne of glory, he will present his perfect praises with unalloyed rejoicing. In the mean time we should not be reluctant to sow in tears, whilst we remain in this world of sorrow. When we mourn for our sins, or sympathize with the afflicted, or suffer for Christ's sake, or endure chastisements, we are "sowing in tears to reap in joy." But let us be sure to sow good seed, to be thus watered with our tears, exercising repentance, faith, love, and patience, continuing instant in prayer, and in the use of every means of grace; and being unwearied in every good work, though we should meet with ingratitude and discouragement from every quarter: then we shall "doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing our sheaves with us," for none of our labours, sorrows, or prayers, will be lost; and if others are not profited by them, they will return into our own bosom, and augment our gracious and eternal reward. But whether we rejoice in present comforts, or solace ourselves under sorrows, in hope of this glorious event, let us not forget our brethren in tribulation: but let us pray for the support of every suffering saint; and for the deliverance of the church from oppression, from the defilement of heresy and iniquity, and from the debilitating effect of division. Let sinners also recollect, how dreadful their case will be, if they have all their little joy in this mourning world, and nothing hereafter but weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth: and let us all remember that "God is not mocked; for whatsoever a man soweth, that also shall he reap."

3 Lo, ¹ children are an heritage of the LORD: and the fruit of the womb is his reward.

NOTES.

PSALM CXXVII. Title. It is probable, that Solomon composed this psalm, when he succeeded to the throne of Israel, and was about to build the temple: for the same particle is used which is elsewhere translated of. "A Song of degrees, or psalm of Solomon:" Or, a most excellent song of Solomon.

V. 1. The duty of constantly and entirely depending on God, in every undertaking, is here inculcated. The Psalmist did not mean, that diligence, vigilance, and skill should not be employed; but that God should be depended on, or they must be employed in vain. "Paul may plant, and Apollos water; but God alone giveth the increase."

V. 2. Whilst others perplex themselves with fruitless cares and incessant labours, about their worldly provision, often to no purpose; God in this way of reliance on him giveth sleep to his beloved people: he enables them to do their duty cheerfully, and to leave the event with him in the confidence of faith, and thus to close their eyes in sleep without useless solicitude.

V. 3—3. When worldly men are eagerly pursuing their temporal interests, they commonly profess that they only mean to provide for their families after them. But it entirely depends on the Lord, whether they shall have any children or not; or whether their children shall live with them, and survive them, or whether they will be a comfort, or a grief to them. They, however, who trust in God and walk in his ways, may hope to be comforted in their children; receiving them as a heritage from him, and bringing them up in his fear, they may expect, and will not generally be disappointed, that, as they defended their offspring in helpless infancy, so these will be their defence, and ornament in the decline of life. 'Such children shall be able to stop their adversaries' mouths when their godly life is maliciously accused.' 'In a house full of dutiful children consisteth the happiness of their parents, who then can never want friends; friends that will at no time be ashamed, but will at all times rejoice to appear for them, to meet their enemies and accusers in the gate, or place of judgment, there to answer any charge against them, to vindicate them in their persons, their good name, or their property. It is a glorious sight to behold children thus standing forth in defence of their parents.' —It is a Chinese proverb, that when a son is born into a family, a bow and arrow are hung before the gate.' (Horne.) Parents in general are apt, like Jacob, to be most attached to the children of their old age: but the sons of their youth must be their champions and defenders, and their good conduct reflects most honour on the parent who brought them up.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Whether we build, or plant, or defend our habitations and property, we should remember that our labour and watching will be in vain, except the Lord build, and plant, and watch with us. We should therefore diligently use the proper means, and then expect his blessing; that we may trust in him without presumption. Thus the minister in his labours and watching for the good of souls; thus the Christian in seeking to grow in grace, and to guard against temptation; and thus the sinner in coming to the Saviour, should use all appointed means with persevering application, and yet rely on the Lord alone to render them effectual. This is the method of being safe and easy. For want of attending to this rule, many labour and watch to no purpose. In vain they rise early, sit up late, eat the bread of sorrows, and bereave their souls of good, to provide for themselves and families: whereas, "seeking first the kingdom of God and his righteousness," using moderate diligence in their lawful callings, and casting all their care on God, they would have all needful success, without uneasiness and vexation. But if we enjoy either outward sleep or inward tranquillity, we should give God thanks for it: and we ought never to forget that the rest, the peace, and the provision, which he giveth to his beloved, are far preferable to the much greater prosperity of the wicked.— It ill becomes the professed servants of God to murmur because children are withheld; and still worse to fret because they have a numerous offspring: children are in Scripture considered as a heritage, and a reward from God to his people; and shall we deem them our incumbrance? as if He could not provide for many as well as for a few! When trained up according to his word, they generally prove the best defence, ornament, and comfort in declining years, if parents and children are spared to each other: and they are the seed of the church, and often prove the support of religion, after the decease of their parents. Children also should remember their obligations to their parents, and study to requite them, by being ready to supply their wants, to vindicate their characters, and to protect them from oppression, in their old age. In this case they would be as arrows in the hand of the mighty man; and happy would he be who had his quiver full of them; he need neither be ashamed, nor afraid, to meet his enemies in the gate. Yet all earthly comforts are precarious; but the Lord will assuredly comfort and bless those who trust and serve him: and they who zealously seek the conversion of sinners, will assuredly find their spiritual children to be their joy and crown in the day of Jesus Christ. May all his ministers receive abundantly "this heritage and gift, that cometh of the Lord!"

NOTES.

PSALM CXXVIII. V. 1. 'Some think this was a form prescribed to be used at the blessing of their marriages; when they wished the new-married couple all manner of happiness, especially a long life in peaceable times.' (Bp. Patrick.) It is probable, that this opinion occasioned the insertion of the psalm in 'the form for the solemnization of matrimony,' in our church. No blessing can warrantably be expected in any situation of life, except by those who "fear God and walk in his ways;" and they will be blessed in every station.

V. 2. 'The world esteemeth them happy which live in wealth and idleness: but the Holy Ghost approveth them blest that live on the mean profit of their labours.'

V. 3. The opinion above-mentioned illustrates the propriety of the blessedness secured to a pious man being here viewed with a special respect to the comforts of the married state: for on that supposition newly married persons are exclusively addressed. Yet it is worth while for those who, either from supposed religious motives, or from an idea that wives and children hinder men's interest or comfort, are averse to marriage, either in their own case or that of others, to consider this verse, in which a faithful wife, and a flourishing offspring are considered as most valuable blessings; and some of the most beautiful images in nature are employed by the Holy Spirit, to show what a splace, and ornament, and comfort they are to those who fear God. Would such language have been suggested to the inspired writers, if marriage had been a less holy or less happy state than celibacy? It is observable that Solomon, who probably wrote this psalm, and who afterwards multiplied wives vastly beyond all that preceded him, here speaks of one wife, and no more, as a blessing to a pious man. Polygamy, though connived at, does not seem, even then, to have been general; and certainly it is unnatural, and contrary to domestic comfort.

V. 5, 6. Whatever may be the dispensations of Providence towards believers; (for general rules always admit exceptions, and the preceding verse should be considered as a general rule, not as an express promise;) yet, they shall be blessed out of Zion, "with all spiritual blessings in heavenly things in Christ Jesus." The concluding part of these verses seems to be made difficult in the application of it, by being translated in the future tense, and not in the imperative or optative mood, according to the original. "The LORD shall bless thee out of Zion: and mayest thou," or I pray that thou mayest, "see the good of Jerusalem all thy days: yea, that thou mayest see thy children's children and peace upon Israel." (Gen. xxiv. 60.) It cannot be supposed, that every pious man shall see prosperous times, and a flourishing family; and live to old age. But such a wish and prayer were perfectly suited to the occasion. "Mayest thou be so happy as to see Jerusalem the seat of justice and religion, in a flourishing condition all thy life long. And live to such a good old age, as to see thy children's children, and the whole nation all the while in a prosperous tranquillity." (Bp. Patrick.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Such as fear God and walk in his ways are the only happy persons, whatever their station in life may be. Nor will their comfort be diminished, if they labour hard in any honest calling, for the subsistence of themselves and families, and if they have only the necessaries, without any of the luxuries of life. Indeed their happiness does not consist in relative comforts; and many of them having all things in God, seek not wives and children, or are resigned if bereft of them: yet religion, whilst it teaches the duties of every relation in life, best ensures the comfort of each. Marriage is peculiarly honourable and blessed to him who enters it in the fear of God, and desires to walk with his family according to his will: and he may expect that his wife will be "as a fruitful vine, by the sides of his house, and his children as olive branches round about his table." But the Lord "will bless his people out of Zion:" they shall see and taste of the blessings of his church all the days of their life: and whether they be spared, like old Israel, to see their children's children, and the church in prosperity on earth, or not; they shall certainly share the peace of the heavenly Jerusalem, and bequeath the blessing of God as a legacy to their posterity.

NOTES.

PSALM CXXIX. V. 1, 2. It is not improbably conjectured that this psalm was composed about the time when Sennacherib invaded Judah: but this is no more than conjecture. From the days of Jacob, the ancestor of the nation; and still more, from the time when Pharaoh and the Egyptians began to oppress his descendants, the history of Israel had been almost one uninterrupted narrative of the hardships, injuries, and oppressions, to which they had been exposed from a variety of enemies and persecutors: and yet, God had effectually interposed in their behalf, and no assailant had so prevailed against them, as to destroy them from being a people; nor have they to this day. The same may be said of the true church of God, and indeed in some sense of every believer. "The church now afflicted, ought to remember how that her condition hath been such from the beginning, to be molested most grievously by the wicked; yet in time she hath ever been delivered. Many a time have the righteous been under persecution, from the hour when Cain rose up against his brother Abel to this day. Like the bush which Moses saw in the desert, the church hath burned with fire, yet hath not been consumed; and for the same reason; because God is in the midst of her. He who took our nature upon him was also "afflicted from his youth:" but his enemies prevailed not finally against him." (Horne.)

PSALM CXXX.

The Psalmist, in deep distress, cries unto

'continued our vexation and torment.' (Bp. Patrick.)—The strong figure here employed seems, however, to mark out all the various refinements of cruelty, by which tyrants and persecutors have tortured the people of God: as Pilate not only scourged Jesus, but delivered him to be crucified.

V. 4. In order to torture, they first bound, the sufferer; and in like manner the enslaving of Israel was needful in order to afflict him: but from time to time the righteous God broke the strong cord, or rope, in which he was bound.

V. 5. "They shall all be confounded, &c." The whole passage is evidently a prediction, and not an imprecation. He that hath delivered Israel, and confounded his foes, will continue to do so, till all that persist in enmity to his people shall be destroyed.

V. 6—8. The flourishing and the withering of grass is the constant Scriptural emblem of the prosperity and the ruin of ungodly men. But persecutors are like the worthless grass which grows upon the tops of houses, and withers without coming to any perfection, and consequently hath no blessing pronounced upon it, or employed about it, according to the pious salutations then in use to reapers and mowers. (Note, Ruth ii. 4.) The clause rendered "He that bindeth sheaves," seems to denote the gleaners, who, having gathered ears of corn, and bound them in small bundles, put them in the skirts of their garments, which were held up for that purpose. For reapers or binders do not put the sheaves into their bosom. There would not only be nothing worth reaping, but nothing worth gleaning.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

If we considered how Jesus was scourged, wounded, bruised, and crucified for us; how prophets, apostles, and saints have been treated in all ages; and how the church hath been afflicted and persecuted from her infancy hitherto: we should not complain of hard measures if we were called to endure sharper sufferings than are at present allotted to any of us. And did we remember how Jesus

God, confessing his sin, and determines patiently to wait for his gracious forgiveness, 1—6. He exhorts Israel to hope in God's mercy and plentiful redemption, 7, 8.

^a A Song of degrees.

^b OUT of the depths have I cried unto thee, O LORD.

2 LORD, hear my voice; ^c let thine ears be attentive to the voice of my supplications.

3 If thou, LORD, ^d shouldst mark iniquities, O LORD, who shall stand?

4 But ^e there is forgiveness with thee, that thou mayest be feared.

iii 5. Acts ix. 34. Heb. xii. 24—28.

arose and reigns; how his people have been supported, and have triumphed, in sufferings and death; and how the church still subsists like the burning but unconsumed bush; we need not be anxious about the event respecting ourselves, or the cause of God. He is righteous, and as he hath, so he will, cut asunder the cords which unite persecutors to each other, or with which they would bind his people as sheep for the slaughter. Nor can all nature furnish an emblem sufficiently expressive of the confusion, contempt, and misery, which will overtake all that hate the church and cause of Christ. They will sink for ever under the unmingled curse and wrath of God, and all spectators will exclaim, "So let all thine enemies perish, O Lord!"

NOTES.

PSALM CXXX. V. 1, 2. David is generally supposed to have been the writer of this psalm; though his name is not prefixed to it: but some think that it was composed when he was convinced of his exceedingly heinous guilt in the matter of Uriah, and was in deep inward distress on that account; while others are of opinion that he wrote it when in danger of being overwhelmed by the persecuting rage of Saul: and indeed the general acknowledgment of criminality, in common with other men, does not well accord with David's state of mind, when crying for mercy after his deplorable fall. It seems, however, that inward distresses, arising from the consciousness of sin, concurred with outward troubles and dangers, in sinking him into those depths from whence, (like Jonah from the whale's belly,) he earnestly cried unto the Lord; and was heard and delivered: and therefore it is reckoned one of the penitential psalms. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3, 4. "If I were the most innocent person in the world; yet if thou, LORD, shouldst strictly examine my life, and proceed against me according to my deserts, —I should certainly be condemned." (Bp. Patrick.) —To "mark iniquity," in this connexion, implies, to strictly observe every man's conduct, comparing all and every part of it with the holy law, and punishing all deviation from that perfect standard, according to the strict demands of impartial justice. This will be the measure of the Lord's dealings with all the impenitent and unbelieving; but he does not so mark iniquity as to exclude the penitent and believing from mercy and forgiveness, according to the Gospel. "For there is forgiveness with him:" or a propitiation, as the original word signifies, and as it is translated by the Septuagint; for "without shedding of blood there is no remission;" and "it is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats can take away sin."—But with God, there is forgiveness, through a propitiatory sacrifice, for those that avail themselves of this gracious provision of his love and mercy. "That thou mayest be feared." "Thou most graciously investest us unto thy service, by thy readiness to pardon all that are truly penitent; without the hope of which we could not so much as think of becoming religious." (Bp. Patrick.)—Without the hope of forgiveness, no humble and contrite sinner could escape despair; and none else "have the fear of God before their eyes." So that without this hope there could be no genuine piety among the fallen descendants of Adam. (Note, Gen. xxii. 10—12.) For if there were no forgiveness with God, men would not only be without hope, but without the regeneration of the Holy Spirit, and so be given up to the desperate enmity of their fallen nature. But the consciousness of guilt, and the fear of wrath, united with the hope of mercy, bring the sinner into a proper disposition to seek and wait for salvation: and as hope and filial love dispel slavish fear, humble reverence and a dread of dishonouring his gracious Friend, gather strength in the believer's soul.

V. 5, 6. The word of God reveals and promises forgiveness to the penitent: faith credits this revelation, and waits with humble expectation the fulfilment of the promise, and obtaining the joy of God's salvation. Thus the Psalmist "waited for the LORD, more than they that watch for the morning." Some understand this of the Psalmist's being earlier at his devotions than the watchers were at the sanctuary, who resorted thither at the break of day. But perhaps it means that he longed for some tokens of God's pardoning love, more eagerly than the bewildered benighted traveller, or the endangered mariner, looks out for the dawn. (Acts xvii. 29.) "My soul waiteth for the LORD, and longeth for his comfortable presence more than the watchman who is forced to be awake the whole night, waiteth for the break of day, that he may be discharged." (Bp. Hall.)

- * I wait for thy salvation, Lord,
- * With strong desires I wait;
- * My soul, invited by thy word,
- * Stands watching at thy gate.
- * Just as the guards that keep the night,
- * Long for the morning skies,

- * So waits my soul to see thy grace,
- * And more intent than they,
- * Meets the first openings of thy face,
- * And finds a brighter day.' (Watts.)

V. 7, 8. 'The church of Israel was exhorted to hope in JEHOVAH, because with him there was mercy, and plenteous redemption,' (or, a great redemption.) 'And of what nature was that redemption? A redemption from sin: "He shall redeem Israel from all his iniquities;" and consequently from all trouble and misery, which are but the effects of sin, and will cease when that shall be finally taken away. Now what is this but the Gospel itself?' (Horne.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Whilst sin is plunging millions of unbelievers into the depths of hell to rise no more; even believers are often brought by it under deep distress of conscience, fears of wrath, outward calamities, and sore temptations. What need then have we to watch against every approach of this only evil! Yet even from those depths into which sin hath cast us, we should without delay, and with extraordinary earnestness, cry unto the Lord: nor can any deep dungeon or cavern, or even deep guilt, exclude the relenting sinner from the presence of his merciful God, who will raise all that make supplication to him from the depths of distress, from the gates of hell, from the borders of the grave, and at length from the grave itself. Indeed should the Lord so mark all our iniquities according to his holy law, as to deal with us with the rigour of strict justice, what man could endure the trial, or venture into his awful presence? But there is abundant forgiveness with him, which he can honourably exercise: so that the chief of sinners may now bow before his mercy-seat, become his acceptable worshipper, and at length stand accepted before his holy tribunal. And faith in his mercy and truth, confirmed by experience, form the soul to the holy fear and love of the Lord our God. Happy then are they who hope in his word of promise, and wait for the discoveries of his pardoning mercy, in the appointed way. Their anxious fears may indeed disquiet them, whilst the Lord proves their faith, sincerity, and humility, by salutary delays. But the day will dawn, and the Sun of Righteousness arise upon them to set no more. Then they will rejoice, and encourage their brethren to hope and wait for the Lord; and exhort all their fellow-sinners to seek his salvation: seeing that "with him there is mercy, and plenteous redemption" through the atoning blood of Jesus, "who shall redeem his people from all their iniquities." NOTES.

PSALM CXXXI. V. 1, 2. David was accused by his brethren as an aspiring man, who was actuated by pride and ambition in the services which he performed: and by Saul as aiming to dethrone him and usurp the kingdom. But he could appeal to God, that he should have been well satisfied in privacy and obscurity, and in the meaner occupations of a shepherd, without intermeddling with affairs of state, or other “matters too high for him.” Indeed he had learned to be as indifferent about such worldly advantages, as the weaned child becomes to the milk, when it has learned to relish other nutriment. ‘Committing myself to thy care, and depending on thy providence, as a child that is newly weaned doth upon its mother: just so do I silence my natural desires, and am content to be disposed of as thou pleasest.’ (Bp. Patrick.) The clause rendered “Surely I have, &c.” is literally, “If I have not, &c.” That is, ‘Then let my enemies prevail against me.’ (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. ‘And let all good men, in like manner, modestly place their hope and confidence in the Lord,—and choose rather to be depressed, than by any undue means to raise themselves to greatness and honour.’ (Bp. Patrick.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The proud man is insolent in his deportment, and despises mean persons, situations, and occupations; he is vain-glorious and ambitious, aspiring after great connexions and important employments, engaging in deep schemes and speculations, and courting observation and applause. But he, who is conscious of his unworthiness and insufficiency, will be satisfied in a low situation, and with any honest employment, and will reluctantly leave any obscure station to exercise himself in great matters which appear too high for so mean a person. The grace of God also teaches the believer quiet submission to humbling dispensations, and indifference about worldly acquisitions; so that having acquired a relish for heavenly things, his soul is weaned even from those objects to which he once was most addicted; at least he is aiming at and praying for this happy frame of spirit. Yet appearances may be against him. The Lord may call him forth, and make it his duty, to engage in important and public undertakings; and his zeal and love may be censured as ambition and ostentation, by rivals or enemies: yet his appeal will be made to the heart-searching God, and sometimes this may be done even before his accusers. Genuine humility in the highest stations in society, or in the church, will appear by teachableness, patience under delays and contradictions, persevering benevolence, a determination to use no unhallowed means, and a quiet spirit under reproaches and unjust suspicions. Thus did the lowly Jesus pursue his heavenly path: he was accused of claiming honours which it was supposed did not belong to him, and on this accusation he was condemned to death: but his resurrection and exaltation completely refuted the vile calumny. Of him David was the type; and every one of his disciples must copy his example of humility, of heaven-mindedness, of active love, and of patience under the cross: and let all such Israelites hope in the Lord, under every reproach and affliction, from henceforth and for ever.

NOTES.

PSALM CXXXII. V. 1. ‘There are those that think Solomon penned this psalm: because he concludes his prayer at the consecration of the temple, with some part of it: (8—10. 2 Chr. vi. 41, 42:)—and it is not an improbable conjecture.’ (Bp. Patrick.)—David had endured many afflictions, before he came to the throne: but he would use no unhallowed means of obtaining that dignity, which he knew was intended for him. In this he was the type of Christ, who willingly endured the cross before he entered into his glory. Afterwards, besides many trials and sorrows, David laid himself out with earnest zeal for the glory of God, and especially in preparing for the temple, which Solomon his son was chosen to build; who thus besought God, in concert with his people, to remember his pious father's labours and sorrows, and to prosper the design about which his heart had been so much engaged.

V. 2—5. Nothing is recorded concerning this vow in the history of David: but perhaps when his own house was nearly finished, he vowed that he would not inhabit it, till he had pitched upon a place in which to station the ark, as it had been placed at Shiloh. Or perhaps, having procrastinated too long, amidst his difficulties upon his first accession to the throne, he made one morning a solemn vow, that he would come to a decision in this matter, before he went to rest. Some think, that the very spot on which the temple should be built, was intended: and that David made this vow on the morning, when the pestilence came upon Israel because he had numbered the people; and that the threshing-floor of Ornan was pointed out to him, in consequence of this resolution. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6. Some learned men are of opinion that Jerusalem, not being at a great distance from Bethlehem, was within the district called Ephratah: and others think that Shiloh, in the tribe of Ephraim, is meant; because the Ephraimites are once called Ephrathites. (Judg. xii. 5. Original.) According to this opinion, the meaning of the verse is that David had heard how long the ark had been stationed at Shiloh; whereas when he went to seek this sacred symbol he found it in a solitary field near a forest. But perhaps the proper interpretation is, that when he lived at Bethlehem-Ephratah, he had often heard of the ark, and how it was neglected: and in the prospect of being king, he had determined to place it in a more conspicuous situation. Accordingly after his accession to the throne, he went in quest of it, and found it at Kirjath-jearim, an obscure place situated near a wood; and thence he conveyed it to the royal city, where a splendid temple was afterwards prepared for it. Christ the true ark of the covenant was first heard of at Bethlehem-Ephratah, and found there among the cattle, as if he had been in the fields of the wood.

V. 8. (Note, 2 Chr. vi. 41, 42.) The ark was never removed from the holy of holies in the temple, till the captivity, when it was lost or destroyed. This was therefore the Rest of the symbol of the Lord's gracious presence with his people.

V. 9. 'Thy priests will be clothed,' &c. It may be expected that thou, O Lord, wilt overrule this happy event for a very great blessing to thy priests, and by their means to thy people.

V. 10. 'I beseech thee, have a respect to the sincere piety of my father David, and thy gracious promise to him; and upon that account deny me not, but grant the petitions of thy servant, who, by thy special appointment, succeeds him in the government of thy people.' (Bp. Patrick)

V. 11, 12. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 17. After the decease of David, his kingdom was made to bud forth in his successive descendants, until at length it was established in the person of the Messiah: and the kings, who as lamps, were situated in Jerusalem, arising from David the first anointed of the family, at length introduced the Light of the world, and the glory of Israel. pecially such as carry on the same pious designs, and pray to be remembered for their sake. They who have in them the mind of Christ, will prefer the honour of God and the welfare of his church to their own indulgence, ease, or emolument; and will counteract their propensity to procrastination, by engaging themselves as soon as possible to execute useful purposes, to whatever self-denial or weariness they may be exposed. But we should first, without delay, seek to have our own hearts made “an habitation of God through the Spirit.” Though external splendour or exactness are by no means essential to godliness: yet they who have it in their power, should be vigilant and diligent in bringing the ordinances of God into public view, and in establishing them in decency and regularity; that the people in general may be encouraged to “go into his tabernacles, and worship at his footstool.” When we have used the proper means, we may confidently expect the Lord’s presence and blessing; and when his ministers are clothed with righteousness and salvation, his saints will shout for joy. But if the Lord answered the prayers, grounded on his covenant with David, he will never turn away his face from us, when we plead the covenant made with his anointed Prophet, Priest, and King. In him the promises, which were ratified to David, have their full completion: his church is that Zion which he hath chosen and desired for his habitation, in which he will rest and be glorified for ever: whilst he blesses the spiritual provisions of his house, to the nourishment of the souls of his people; he will not withhold from his poor the food convenient for their bodies: and blessed are they who are employed to dispense either the bread of life or bodily sustenance to his needy servants, out of love to him, and to them for his sake; receiving his salvation themselves, and contributing to the comfort of his saints. But whilst the crown shall flourish in the person of the Son of David, and his people rejoice in his honour and felicity; all his enemies will be clothed with everlasting shame and misery.

NOTES.

PSALM CXXXIII. Title. This psalm seems to have been penned when all the tribes of Israel had concurred in placing David on the throne, or rather after that their subsequent prosperity had evinced the happy effects of that union; when, instead of the tribes wasting each other by civil contests, they all harmoniously joined in removing the ark to Mount Zion, and in celebrating the sacred ordinances of their religion. “It was as fitly used by the first Christians, to express their joy for the blessed union of Jews and Gentiles; and may now serve the uses of all

V. 1. In the union of brethren, all that is reasonable, beneficial, beautiful, and pleasant, (however divided in other things,) meet together.

V. 2. The sacred ointment, which God had prescribed for the unction of his priests to their office, being poured upon the head of Aaron, (and of succeeding high priests,) flowed thence upon his beard, and down on the collar of his vestment, near the place where he bore the names of the twelve tribes, diffusing fragrant around. This was an emblem of the graces of the Holy Spirit, which through our great High Priest are communicated to all believers; and it also aptly represented the pleasant and beneficial effects of harmony in society, when, united under one common head, every member in his proper station shares, and contributes to, the peace, stability, and prosperity of the whole community.

V. 3. This verse may be rendered, “As the dew of Hermon; so is this which descends, &c.” and means, that as the gentle dews descending on mount Hermon rendered it fruitful and delightful; so the dew of heavenly love distilling upon the worshippers on mount Zion, would render them fruitful in good works, happy in themselves, and blessings to all around them. For on that mount, (the type of the true church which is all one in Christ Jesus,) the Lord hath commanded his blessing, even life for evermore. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

No encomiums or illustrations can sufficiently display the excellency, pleasantness, and manifold benefits of harmony among brethren, in families, in civil society, in nations, and especially in the church of Christ: for “love is of God; and he that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God, and God in him.” It is the fruit of the Spirit, the image of Christ, the evidence of our union with him, and the ornament of his Gospel. With it human happiness begins on earth, and will be completed in heaven. It tends to fruitfulness in all good works, and to the spread of vital godliness: it inhabits especially, as a visitant from heaven, those favoured spots, where the Lord commands his blessing, and gives eternal life; and whilst it prepares the soul for further communications from above, it is the certain effect of the pouring out of the Spirit, to give success to the preaching of the Gospel. Surely the professed followers of the meek and lowly Jesus have long enough experienced the painful and fatal effects of discord and angry controversy; by which Christianity has been disgraced, and wounded in the house of its friends! all that love the Lord at length make trial how good and pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity, "forbearing one another, and forgiving one another, as "God for Christ's sake hath forgiven them." Then will they find their own hearts joyful, and the truth diffuse its blessed influence on every side; and heaven will, as it were, come down and dwell on earth. And may God be pleased to send peace, unity, and concord, together with the Gospel of peace and love, to all the nations of the world!

NOTES.

PSALM CXXXIV. V. 1—3. It seems that David appointed some of the priests and Levites to watch all night in the sanctuary, by regular courses: and they are here exhorted to spend the hours in joyful songs of praise. Thus the service of the sanctuary would be a shadow of the unceasing worship of heaven. It is probable that this psalm was composed to be sung each night, when the watch was set; and that the first two verses were sung by the precentor of those who were about to leave the sanctuary; and the third verse by the Levites, who succeeded them.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

If our hearts were filled with the love of God, as his holy law commands, our mouths would be filled with his praises: and though our frail bodies would need rest, yet our souls would never be weary of his pleasant service. No time would then be a burden to us; nor would it be needful to waste the hours by trifling conversation and vain amusements, or by inordinate animal indulgence: but all the time, which could be spared from needful business and recreation, would be delightfully employed in meditation, and in celebrating the praises of our God. All that comes short of this, is equally distant from perfection; it is the effect of the fall, and the remainder of depravity: and without some portion of this spirit we are not Christians. But the servants of God, who minister in his sanctuary, are peculiarly bound to set an example of this cheerful and constant engagement of heart, in the worship and work of God. They, as well as others, should be thankful to be reminded of their duty, and exhorted "to lift up "their hands in the sanctuary, and praise the LORD:" and we should especially pray for a blessing out of Zion on those who excite us to attend on our duty. Ere long all the true servants of God shall praise him in the sanctuary above, and bless his name, and be blessed in him, uninter-ruptedly for evermore.

NOTES.

PSALM CXXXV. V. 1, 2. 'This perhaps was the morning hymn, which the precentor called upon the Levites to sing, at the opening of the gates of the temple; as the former was sung at the shutting up the gates in the evening.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 3. 'As his nature is most excellent, so He is the Fountain of all the good we enjoy; and no employment is so delightful as to acknowledge his perfections, and commemorate the benefits we have received from him, by singing psalms and hymns of praise and thanksgiving.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 4. For the, &c. (Notes, Ex. xix. 5.)

V. 5, 6. Other nations indeed praised their gods, and celebrated their imaginary exploits: but the Psalmist, in the most decided manner, declared that he knew JEHOVAH was far above them all; and alone worthy to be thus adored and honoured; as the great Creator and absolute Sovereign of the universe.

V. 7. (Notes, Job xxviii. 23—28. xxxviii. 22—30.)
 ‘Among the Greeks and Romans, we meet with a Jupiter possessed with the thunder and lightning, and an Æolus ruling over the winds: the Psalmist teacheth us to restore the celestial artillery to its rightful owner.’—‘It is a great instance of the divine wisdom and goodness, that lightning should be accompanied by rain, to soften its rage, and prevent its mischievous effects.’ (Horne.)

V. 8—12. (Notes on the texts referred to in the margin.)
 V. 14. Repent. ‘If he judge his people, or punish them, he will compassionate their sorrows.’ ‘He will be pacified towards his people.’

V. 15—21. (Notes, &c. Ps. cxv. 3—11.) In the Scripture referred to, the exhortation is to “trust in the LORD;” here it is “to bless the LORD.” They who trust in the Lord, honour him, and shall daily have more and more cause to praise him.—‘The honour the heathens give to their lifeless images ought to excite you all with the greater devotion, to praise the Lord of the world.’ (Bp. Patrick.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

How lamentable it is, that we should need so much exciting to praise our God, and yet be so negligent and formal in this reasonable service, in which we have such cause to abound! But his servants must on earth be trained up to that holy exercise, in which they are to be occupied for ever in heaven: and in his courts his ministers must instruct, and go before them, in this sacred employment.—The essential goodness and excellency of the Lord would entitle him to our utmost love and praise, were it possible for us to be free from other obligations to him: and the pleasantness of the work would endear it to us, if our hearts were free from the pestilence of sin. But to the Lord we owe our being, our rational powers, and all our outward comforts; which alone demand our warmest gratitude; and the peculiar favours vouchsafed to

Britons, both in providence and in the spiritual advantages afforded us, place us in the same relation, and under the same obligations to him, with the Israelites of old. Whilst his moderate rains fructify our land, and we are generally exempted from fatal tempests and inundations: how often have the winds from his treasures dispersed the preparations of our formidable enemies! How inexcusable then is our national infidelity, impiety, and licentiousness! “O foolish people, and unwise, do ye thus requite the Lord!” He has, however, a remnant among us, “whom he has chosen unto him, through sanctification of the Spirit, unto obedience, and the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus.” These are indeed his peculiar treasure which he values, by whom he is loved and adored on earth, and in whom he will be eternally glorified. Happy then are they: their unchangeable Friend is equally great and good; and equally able and willing to defend, uphold, and bless them. “He doeth what he pleases in heaven, and earth, in the seas, and in all deep places.” It hath pleased him to make them his people; and it is his “good pleasure to give them the kingdom.” The tokens and wonders which he wrought for Israel, and the heritage that he gave them, were feeble shadows of the mercy he hath shown to his true Israel, the redemption wrought out, and the inheritance prepared for them: and every past and present favour, is a token and earnest of his future and eternal love. For he is immutably perfect, and the memorial of his wonders for his people shall endure throughout all generations: He will plead their cause, and judge between them and their enemies: and though he afflict and correct them, he will repent concerning them, and not be wroth with them for ever. (Notes, Psalm xc. 13.) Whilst therefore we detest the idolatries and impiety of the world around us; let us remember with gratitude who hath made us to differ; let us pity and pray for benighted heathens and deluded sinners; and let us, whether ministers or private Christians, whilst we trust and fear the Lord, bless him in his church on earth; rejoice in hope of praising him in his holy habitation in heaven; and endeavour to glorify his name and recommend his truth, not only with our lips, but in our holy lives, and in copying the example of his righteousness, goodness, and truth, in all our dealings with our brethren and neighbours.

NOTES.

PSALM CXXXVI. V. 1. This psalm in many things resembles the preceding: but it is rendered remarkable by the repetition of the sweet sentence, “for his mercy endureth for ever,” at the end of every verse. By mercy we understand the Lord’s disposition to compassionate and relieve those whom sin has rendered miserable and vile; his readiness to forgive and be reconciled to the most provoking of transgressors, and to bestow all blessings upon them: together with all the provision that he hath made, for the honour of his name in the redemption of sinners by Jesus Christ. The counsels of this mercy have been from everlasting: the effects of it will be eternal to all who are interested in it: and the Lord continues, from age to age, equally ready to show mercy to all who sue to him for it. The frequent repetition of this sentence shows how greatly the Lord delights in mercy, and deems himself honoured by the exercise of it; and teaches us that this attribute should be peculiarly dear to us, being the source of all our hopes and comforts.—“At every half verse, one half of the choir answers to the other in these words: “For his mercy endureth for ever:” a form of acknowledgment prescribed by David to be used continually in the divine service.’ (Bp. Patrick.) ‘A form highly proper for creatures, sinful creatures to use, whose great employment it is now, and will be for ever, to magnify the mercy and loving kindness of their God.’ (Horne.)—‘This was a common kind of thanksgiving, which the whole people used, when they had received any benefit of God; (Marg. Ref.) meaning that God was not only merciful to their fathers, but also continued the same to their posterity.’

V. 4. ‘How many of those for whom the wonders of creation, providence, and redemption have been wrought, think none of them worthy their attention! Angels admire, and adore, where man will not deign to cast an eye, or employ a thought.’ (Horne.)

V. 5—9. (Notes, Gen. i.)

V. 10—22. (Notes on the texts referred to in the margin.) The destruction of the Egyptians, Ammonites, and Canaanites, with their kings, was a display of God’s justice towards them, but of his abundant mercy and goodness to his people.

PSALM CXXXVII.

The pious captives at Babylon bewail Zion's desolations, complain of the insults of their oppressors, and declare their inviolable attachment to Jerusalem, 1—6. They pray that God would remember the conduct of Edom ; and they predict the doom of Babylon, 7—9.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Repetitions, disgusting to the fastidious, are often salutary and necessary, because we are prone to overlook or forget the Lord's goodness and mercy : yet they convey a severe reproof, and should cause us to unite humiliation with our gratitude to our condescending Instructor. The works of creation proclaim the wisdom, power, and goodness of JEHOVAH, the "God of gods and Lord of lords ;" while the continuance of the settled course of nature, and the blessings thus communicated by a kind Providence to a rebellious world, are proofs of his patience and ever-enduring mercy. Nay, his denunciations of vengeance against impenitent sinners should be considered as tokens of his mercy, and be improved as warnings to repent, and flee from the wrath to come : and his judgment upon persecutors and oppressors is evidently the effect of his mercy to his church. The destruction of opposing kings and nations, with a strong hand and an out-stretched arm, was as conducive to the good of Israel, as the manna, the water from the rock, and the conducting cloud. And in like manner, the crucifixion of our lusts, and the sharp corrections by which the Lord promotes our sanctification, are as blessed tokens of his mercy, as the forgiveness of our sins and the consolations of his Holy Spirit : and our complete salvation will be connected with the final destruction of all the enemies of God and of our souls. Blessed be his name who hath remembered us lost sinners, in our low estate, and hath provided salvation to us through his Son, and revealed it in his holy word : may we experience his redeeming power in our hearts, that being "saved from "our enemies, we may serve him in righteousness all our "days : " and may he, who giveth food to all flesh, feed our souls unto eternal life : and enliven our affections by his grace, that we may give thanks and praise to his holy name, "because he is good, and because his mercy endureth for ever."

NOTES.

PSALM CXXXVII. V. 1—6. It is not known by whom this psalm was written : but the occasion is evident ; and the pathetic abruptness, so suited to that occasion with which it opens, is admirably beautiful. The captive Jews, by the rivers of Babylon, sat down and wept, whilst they recollected their former prosperity : and especially they remembered with tears the desolate state of the holy city and the temple of God, their own destitution of sacred ordinances, and the apparently ruined state of the church and people of Israel : for these calamities were brought on them by their national transgressions, to which they had all contributed. No longer, therefore, able to divert their melancholy by singing songs of praise, they hanged their harps upon the willows, which grew in abundance in that moistened soil, which perhaps they were employed in cultivating. Their insulting victors and oppressors demanded of them, to gratify their curiosity, or administer to their entertainment, by singing one of the songs of Zion : by which they meant to deride their confidence in JEHOVAH, and to express their triumph over the religion, as well as over the city and country, of their poor captives. But they were not only indisposed (probably too much,) for joyful praise ; but they would not, they could not, profane their sacred songs, to increase the insolence of their idolatrous masters ; and therefore they said one to another, or to those who demanded this of them, "how shall we sing the LORD's song in a "strange land ? " Neither fear nor favour could extort this "service from our Levites, but they resolutely answered, "As those songs were not made for pastime or sport ; but "in honour of the great Lord of the world : so, how can you "imagine that miserable slaves are disposed to sing ? and to "sing those songs in the land where we are exiles, which "recount the mercies of God to us, in our once flourishing "country."—(Bp. Patrick.) Yet Jerusalem, and the interests of religion were still uppermost in their thoughts and affections : and the Psalmist, in the name of his brethren, declared that he would rather be deprived of his skill in music, and have his tongue cleave to the roof of his mouth, than forget the songs of Zion, or do otherwise than prefer the interests of the church to every personal advantage or pleasure. The persons immediately concerned seem to have been Levites, who had been singers at the temple, and who had brought their instruments along with them.

V. 7-9. The Edomites, though of the same stock with the Jews, were inveterate in their hatred of them, and excited the Chaldeans utterly to destroy their city and temple: and, for this and other injuries, their ruin had long been predicted. The destruction of Babylon, with every circumstance of terror and misery, had also been foretold: (Marg. Ref.) so that this was merely a prayer of the church for deliverance, in the predicted manner, with the extermination of their implacable enemies, root and branch, as Israel had been commissioned to destroy the Canaanites; and a declaration, that the persons employed in executing this vengeance on Babylon, and effecting this deliverance of his people, would be peculiarly favoured and prospered by Providence, though the work should be accompanied with the retaliation of those cruelties, which had been committed upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem. Babylon was a type of the antichristian corrupters and oppressors of the New Testament-church, which are likewise to be destroyed in a most dreadful manner. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When we are suffering the effects of our personal or national transgressions, we should recollect with godly sorrow our forfeited mercies, and our sins by which we have lost them; that by repentance and prayer we may seek deliverance and the restoration of our privileges. Whilst worldly men grieve for the loss of their outward prosperity; the believer mourns over his banishment from the ordinances of God, and for the despised and desolate state of religion: especially when he hears the insults and blasphemies of infidels, and profane scoffers; who being employed to correct the offending people of God, triumph, as if he could not, or would not, plead their cause. In such circumstances, it is hard to preserve the mind in tranquillity, and to be duly thankful for remaining unmerited mercies. Sacred things, however, must on no consideration be profaned to please ungodly men; nor the songs of Zion sung to gratify their humour or embolden their insolence. (Matt. vii. 6.) In such an evil day it is best to keep silence, or to

PSALM CXXXVIII.

David praises the mercy and truth of God, who had answered his prayers, 1-3. He prophesies that all kings shall praise God and rejoice in his ways, 4, 5. He shows the Lord's dealings with the humble and the proud, and professes full confidence in him, 6-8.

complain unto God and among his people. Yet no calamity, no strange land, no prevalence of ungodliness, no despised oppressed state of the church, should induce us to forget Jerusalem. If personal advantages and prosperity ever render a professor satisfied at a distance from the ordinances of God, ashamed of his despised cause, or indifferent about the interests of the church, so as not to prefer them to his chief joy; a worse calamity has befallen him, than if his right hand withered, or his tongue cleaved to the roof of his mouth. For the Lord will not forsake his church in her low estate; he will execute predicted vengeance on all her persecutors, principals and accessaries: and if professed Christians join with them in their prosperity, they will be joined with them in the day of wrath. We cannot pray for promised success to the church of God, without implying a prayer for the ruin of her implacable enemies: and the instruments of good to the people of God, will in one way or other, be instrumental to the condemnation of impenitent sinners. It is more agreeable to be instruments of good to the people of God or to our fellow-sinners, than executioners of vengeance on his enemies: though the latter may be accepted and blessed, if men act in obedience to his command, and out of zeal for his glory. Let us however, be decidedly on the Lord's part; for his cause will at length prevail, and destruction will be to the workers of iniquity; but his true people, though here, as in a strange land, they are often insulted, despised, hated, and grieved, and put out of frame for singing the Lord's song; yet shall soon come to Zion, and resume their harps, and rejoice in their God for evermore. (Isaiah xxxv. 10.)

NOTES.

PSALM CXXXVIII. Title. The Septuagint entitles this 'A Psalm of, or for, David, Haggai, and Zechariah,' perhaps meaning, that these prophets taught the congregation to use it, in giving thanks for Israel's return from captivity.

V. 1. Gods. 'Thy holy angels shall be witnesses of my gratitude, which I will express in Psalms and Hymns, in the presence of the great assembly of the judges, that they may remember to whom they owe their power and authority.' (Bp. Patrick.) Perhaps the Psalmist also meant, that he would praise JEHOVAH in the presence of the most powerful heathen princes, in contempt of the subjects of their idolatrous worship, and as a protest against it.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We ought to glory in ascribing glory to our God; and when we can praise him with our whole heart, we need not be reluctant for the whole world to witness our gratitude and joy in him. They who rely on his loving kindness and truth through Jesus Christ, will be sure to find him faithful to his word. In performing his promises, he more magnifies his perfections, than in all his other works; of which he hath given us an illustrious specimen and earnest, in sending the promised Saviour "to be the propitiation for our sins;" and "If he spared not his own Son—how shall he not with him freely give us all things?" In the day that the Redeemer cried in the agony of his soul, he heard him, and strengthened him to finish the arduous work assigned to him; having humbled himself even to the death upon the cross, he is now exalted to the throne of glory. And for his sake the Lord will strengthen all who fervently pray in his name, that they may be carried through all their trials; (Eph. iii. 16. Col. i. 11.) their experience will more and more embolden them in saying, "Though I walk in the midst of trouble, thou wilt revive me: thou wilt stretch forth thine hand against the wrath of mine enemies, and thy right hand shall save me." Yea, the Lord will perfect the salvation of every true believer: and though he hath been often provoked to destroy the works of his hands, as Creator: (Isaiah xxvii. 11:) yet he will never forsake those whom he hath created anew in Christ Jesus unto good works. Let then all who trust in and call upon him, praise him with joyful hearts. "Let them sing in the ways of the LORD; for great is the glory of the LORD;" in order that sinners may hear, and be convinced that they are a happy people, and be induced to seek his face. And they will not seek in vain: "For though the LORD be high, yet he hath respect to every lowly" humbled sinner: but the proud, the impenitent and unbelieving, are known by him as his enemies, and will be banished far from his blissful presence. Nor will kings and princes be excepted from this general rule. They too must hearken

V. 2. Magnified, &c. The accomplishment of the Lord's promises to David, notwithstanding all opposition and difficulties, peculiarly honoured his word of grace and truth. In like manner, that display of his glory which is made by his holy word, and the salvation there revealed, exceeds, and as it were eclipses, the glory of all his other works; and the giving and fulfilling his promises to sinners, are especially "to the praise of his glory," even the glory of his "grace," and truth, "wherein he hath abounded toward us, in all wisdom and prudence."

V. 3. When God strengthens the faith, hope, love, patience, and holy fortitude of his afflicted servants, he strengthens them with strength in their souls: and though their outward trials and sufferings continue: yet their prayers are answered in the most desirable manner. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4, 5. Perhaps David expected that his example and instructions would have a good effect on the neighbouring princes. These verses, however, are an evident and remarkable prophecy of the calling of the Gentiles, and of such a prevalence of true religion as hath not yet taken place on earth. The Lord Jesus in his agony prayed more fervently; he was strengthened with strength in his soul; he was at length raised from the dead; and then the Gentile nations, and at length some of their princes, heard and embraced the Gospel, and sang psalms of joyful praise, while walking "in the ways of the LORD;" "for great was the glory of the LORD." What will it then be, when "all kings shall fall down before him, all nations shall do him service?"

V. 6. "He humbled himself and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross, wherefore God hath highly exalted him." "Let that mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7. Revive, or Quicken. (Note cxix. 25.) Either preserve alive, restore to life, render lively and cheerful, or "give life more abundantly;" David was kept alive, rendered lively, and made more earnest in religion by his sufferings: but Christ was restored to life, as the first fruits of the resurrection, of which all his people shall participate.

V. 8. "Though my enemies rage never so much, yet the Lord, who hath begun his good work in me, will continue his grace to the end."

PSALM CXXXIX.

David contemplates, with adoring surprise, the omniscience and omnipresence of God, 1—13. He praises him as his all-wise and bountiful Creator, and for his numberless mercies, 14—18. He avows his abhorrence of the wicked: and prays to be proved and directed in the right way, 19—24.

to the words of his mouth, and humble themselves before his mercy-seat; that being made partakers of his grace, they may rejoice in his ways, and use their pre-eminence in advancing his glory: otherwise, where the Saviour is, thither they cannot come. Lord, hasten that time, when all the kings of the earth shall praise thy name, and be obedient to the words of thy mouth.

NOTES.

PSALM CXXXIX. Title. It is probable that David wrote this psalm, when accused of traitorous designs against Saul; as a solemn appeal to God that he was, in that respect, entirely innocent.

V. 1. (Marg. Ref.) 'I am accused of grievous crimes, O Lord: but my comfort is, that thou seest I am not guilty of them.' (Bp. Patrick.) The language employed in this and the following verses, is taken from the affairs of men; who by diligent search find out those things which had been carefully concealed from them.

V. 2. Thought. 'He confesseth that neither our actions, thoughts, nor any part of our life, can be hid from God, though he seem afar off.' 'My inclinations are so perfectly understood by thee, that before I have conceived any design it is visible to thee.' (Bp. Patrick.)

'My thoughts, before they are my own,

'Are to my God distinctly known.

'He knows the words I mean to speak,

'Ere from my opening lips they break.' (Watts.)

V. 3. Men are most tempted to sin, either when being from home, they are no longer under restraint from those neighbours or relations whose censure they dread; or when in secret, as in the bed-chamber, they have no apprehension of being detected by any human eye: but the Psalmist recollected that God saw him, and was present with him, in every situation; as He "compassed his path and bed, and was acquainted with all his ways," even those which he most carefully concealed from his fellow-creatures. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6. 'When we reflect that "all things are naked and open to him with whom we have to do;" that although he dwelleth in the highest heavens, he surveyeth not only the outward acts, but even the very hearts and imaginations of men on earth; must not each of us cry out, "Such knowledge is too wonderful for me! it is high, I cannot attain unto it:" "I cannot admire it enough; for I cannot conceive of it aright!" (Horne.) — 'The constant consideration of God's actual presence would be the readiest way in the world to make sin to cease from among the children of men, and for men to approach to the blessed estate of the saints in heaven, who cannot sin; for they always walk in the presence, and behold the face of God.' (Bp. Taylor.) It should, however, be noted, that if it were possible for unregenerate men thus habitually to think of the eye of God always upon them; it would no more change their carnal enmity into love, than it does that of evil spirits. Nothing but regeneration, and the sanctification of the Holy Spirit, can make fallen men holy; and the efficacy of all means depends on his powerful operation to render them successful.

V. 8. Bed in hell, &c. 'An uncomfortable place to make a bed in, where there is no rest day or night; yet thousands will make their bed for ever in those flames.' — (Henry.) Should any one murder himself to terminate his sorrow, and escape the remorse of conscience or the consequences of his sins, he must certainly be disappointed. Yet the presence of God, with the senseless corpse in the grave, could not in any degree cause this disappointment, or produce the least effect: but his presence with the disembodied spirit, in the invisible world, as an angry Judge, must in that case be as dreadful as it is unexpected. This then is one passage, where the word Sheol cannot mean exclusively the grave, without rendering the sacred writer's argument absurd or frivolous.

The piety and charity which are practised in cottages; the labour and pain which are patiently endured in the field, or on the bed of sickness; the misery and torment inflicted by persecution in the mines, the galleys, and the dungeons, are all under the inspection of JEHOVAH, and are noted by him against the day of recompense.' (Horne.)

V. 13. 'My most retired thoughts and contrivances, and my most secret desires, are apparent to thee: whose I am, and by whom I was wrapt up in my mother's womb, than which nothing is more hidden and dark.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 14. 'A work so astonishing, that before the Psalmist proceeds in his description of it; he could not help breaking forth in rapture at the thought.' (Horne.)—The verse may be rendered, perhaps more literally; "I will praise thee, for in considering thy wonders, I am filled with astonishment. Thy works are admirable; and my soul knoweth it exceedingly!"

V. 15. 'By the lowest parts of the earth, is undoubtedly to be understood the womb, where the foetus is gradually formed, and matured for the birth, like plants under ground. The process is compared to that in a piece of work wrought with a needle, or fashioned in a loom, which, with all its beautiful variety of colour, and proportion of figure, ariseth by degrees unto perfection, under the hand of the artist from a rude mass of silk, &c.' But 'whereas the human artificer must have the clearest light, whereby to accomplish his task; the divine work-master effecteth all his wonders, in the dark and narrow confines of the womb.' was in thy mind: and accordingly in time, when there was not so much as one of them, they were all fashioned for the several uses to which they were designed, and not the smallest of them omitted or left imperfect.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 17, 18. David delighted to meditate upon the works and perfections of God; such thoughts were precious to him: the glory displayed in them was infinite, the mercies communicated to him were innumerable as the sand; they were new every morning, and were increased with every returning day. (Lam. iii. 22, 23.) 'The thoughts or counsels of JEHOVAH, concerning David, his appointment to the throne, his troubles and preservations in the midst of them, were precious and delightful subjects of meditation and praise; never to be exhausted of the rich matter they contained. With these in his mind he lay down at night to rest; and when he awoke in the morning, his thoughts naturally recurred to the pleasing theme: He began where he had left off; and found himself, in heart and soul, still present with God, still ruminating on him and his works. The mercies of God, in the redemption of the church according to the divine decree; how precious are they to believers! How great is the sum, far exceeding all human arithmetic to name them! Let them be to us the constant subjects of contemplation.—Let death find us engaged in this employment; which when we awake, and arise from the grave, we shall resume and prosecute to eternity, in the presence of God.' (Horne.)

V. 19—22. It is probable that when David composed this psalm, his character lay under a load of calumny: but he could appeal to God that he would have no fellowship with ungodly and cruel men, whom he knew God would destroy: he detested their characters and conduct, and could not endure their company. Being enemies and blasphemers of God, he considered them as his enemies. For the godly man hath the same friends and enemies with his Lord, as far as he knows the real characters of men: yet this is entirely consistent with loving their persons, praying for them, and being kind to them; for we do not know, but they may yet be converted and reconciled to God. The clause rendered, "Thine enemies take thy name in vain," may mean, that they called God to witness the truth of their lying accusations: but it may be translated, "They lift up themselves in vain;" as they will surely be cast down.

V. 23, 24. The Psalmist began by professing his belief, that God had searched him out and known him; and he concluded by praying, that "He would search him, and know his heart and his thoughts:" he did not wish to decline the investigation: he desired to have his real character ascertained, and the springs of his conduct laid open; that he might know himself, and discover every sinful part of his conduct, and repent of it; and that he might be led in the good old way, unto everlasting life; as well as be vindicated from calumnies and suspicions.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

It is more profitable to meditate on divine truths with application to our own cases, and with hearts lifted up to God in prayer; than with a speculative, curious, and disputing frame of mind. The omniscience and omnipresence of God are generally acknowledged: yet they seldom produce their practical effect upon the hearts and conduct of mankind; because they are seldom apprehended by a true and vigorous faith. Hence it is that such numbers allow that their Judge is witness to their whole conduct: and yet are careful to save appearances with their fellow-criminals; whilst they transgress in secret, and amuse their depraved imaginations with every kind of speculative wickedness. Nay, even true believers, through weakness of faith, are often very wavering in obedience, and easily discouraged from it by the trivial circumstances of time, place, company, or solitude. We should therefore by meditation and prayer seek to have our minds suitably affected with the firm belief and habitual recollection, that the just, the holy, the almighty God, fully searches us out, and knows us, however our fellow-creatures may mistake or misrepresent our characters. We should seriously consider, when we are alone, or in company, in the shop, the market, the place of worship, or the closet, that the eye of God is upon us; that "he observeth our down-sitting, and our up-rising, and understandeth our thoughts," whether good or bad, before they become distinctly observed by our own minds, or influential upon our conduct: that he compasseth and investigateth our path, and is accurately acquainted with all our ways; and that he will bring every secret work into judgment, with every word of our lips, and every thought of our hearts. For our God surrounds us continually, and so lays his hand upon us, that we cannot move, or think, without his cognizance and consent. Such meditations are suited to restrain us from sin, even in seasons when secrecy and present advantage give force to Satan's temptations;

24 And ¹ see if there be any ² wicked way in me, ³ and lead me in ⁴ the way everlasting.

t xxv. 8, 9. cxix. 1. 32. cxliii. 10. — u Matt. vii. 14. John xiv. 6. Col. iii. 6.

and to counteract the sinful inclination as soon as it begins to move. Who would dare, if thus suitably impressed, to defraud or deceive his neighbour; to gratify in secret his lust, or malice; or to assume a mask of piety to cover his avarice, injustice, ambition, or sensuality? Recollections of this kind are equally calculated to encourage the believer, in his secret prayers, meditations, self-denial, and almsgiving; his well meant but misrepresented endeavours to do good; and in his conscientious obedience in the midst of slanders and reproaches, or in the most obscure station in society. We soon indeed find, that we cannot comprehend the manner, in which the infinite God knoweth all things: but whilst faith apprehends the truth upon his sure testimony, humility adores the mystery, and confesses, that "such knowledge is too wonderful for her: and it is so high she cannot attain unto it." The belief of God's omnipresence is intimately connected with that of his omniscience, and is of similar efficacy. Should the guilty wretch desire to shun the presence of that God, whose power he cannot resist, and whose mercy he scorns to supplicate; whither shall he flee from him, who is an infinite and all-pervading Spirit? Were it possible for him to find admission into heaven, the displays of the glorious holiness of JEHOVAH would be intolerable to him. The grave, nay the centre of the earth, could not place him at a distance from his righteous Judge: the presence of a God of vengeance kindles the flames of hell: were it possible for him to fly with the velocity of the sun-beam to the most distant regions, or through the immensity of space, he would still meet the presence of his offended God, from whom no darkness can conceal him, "for the darkness and the light to him are both alike." On the other hand the believer cannot be removed, or banished, from the supporting comforting presence of his almighty Friend; who was with Joseph in the prison, with the three young Jews in the fiery furnace, and with Daniel in the lion's den. Should the persecutor's rage take away his life, his soul will the sooner ascend into heaven, and be more sensibly present with his Father and Friend, to his unutterable joy. The grave cannot separate his body from the love of his Saviour, who will raise it incorruptible and glorious. Could he even enter the place of torment, the presence and love of God would prevent his feeling misery. A desolate island, or the remotest region inhabited by the worst of savages; the sultry heat of the torrid zone, or the benumbing cold of polar regions; the deep dark dungeon, cavern, or mine, can by no means exclude him from his God. Whilst he is in the path of duty, he may be happy in any situation, by the exercise of faith, and hope, and prayer. But should he sinfully shift his duty, and, like Jonah, attempt to flee from the presence of the Lord; his arm would arrest, his frown dismay, and his rod correct him, in every place. We should then inquire what the Lord would have us to do, and whither remove? and pray that his gracious presence may always attend us: and then we shall have every thing to hope, and nothing to fear, in life, in death, or in the eternal world.

PSALM CXL.

David prays for deliverance from his malicious persecutors, and predicts their ruin, 1—11. He professes his confidence that God would rescue and bless all his afflicted people, 12, 13.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

DELIVER me, O LORD, from the evil man: preserve me from the violent man;

2 Which imagine mischiefs in their heart; continually are they gathered together for war.

3 They have sharpened their tongues like a serpent; adders' poison is under their lips. Selah.

V. 13—24.

The omnipresent God is our Creator, and has a right to possess and dispose of us as his property: he comprehends our whole frame, which is his marvellous workmanship. The wise and kind contrivance, with which our bodies are formed, should excite our reverent admiration and gratitude: and surely we ought not to use our members and senses, which the Lord hath so curiously fashioned in the womb, as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin. But our immortal and rational souls are a still more noble work and gift of God. Yet had it not been for his precious thoughts of love to us, our reason and immortality would, through our sins, have proved the occasion of our eternal misery. How should we then delight to meditate on his love to sinners in Jesus Christ, the sum of which exceeds all computation; the mercies thence derived are numberless as the sands of the sea! Every morning we awake more indebted, and ought to be more grateful, than before: but when we shall awake in the world of glory, how shall we admire and bless our God for this precious salvation! Yet this God of infinite mercy will most surely destroy all the impenitent workers of iniquity. We should therefore warn our fellow sinners to flee from the wrath to come: and protest against their crimes by separating from their company. But those bloody men, who persecute God's people, and thus join cruelty to their impiety and blasphemy, are most eminently the enemies and haters of God himself; and should therefore be shunned with marked abhorrence by all who love him and his cause: yet we should still pray for their conversion and salvation.—As the Lord knows us perfectly, and we are much strangers to ourselves: we should earnestly desire and pray to be searched and proved, in his providence, and by his word and Spirit: thus we shall best be preserved from self-deception, gradually purified from our remaining sinfulness, and led in the way of everlasting life: and these our desires and prayers will evidence our sincerity, and forward our comfortable assurance, that we are the children of God. (Note, John iii. 19—21.)

4 Keep me, O LORD, from the hands of the wicked: preserve me from the violent man; who have purposed to overthrow my goings.

5 The proud have hid a snare for me, and cords, they have spread a net by the way-side; they have set gins for me. Selah.

6 I said unto the LORD, Thou art my God: hear the voice of my supplications, O LORD.

7 O God the Lord, the Strength of my salvation, thou hast covered my head in the day of battle.

8 Grant not, O LORD, the desires of the wicked: further not his wicked device; lest they exalt themselves. Selah.

NOTES.

PSALM CXL. Title. It is evident that David composed this psalm, when persecuted by Saul, slandered by Doeg, and betrayed by the Ziphites and others. (Notes, lii. cxx.) 'When he came to the kingdom, and had settled the service of God, in the manner which we read in the first of Chronicles, he delivered it to the master of music, to be sung at certain times at the tabernacle. But it was not found, I suppose, (no more than the two foregoing, and the four following,) till some time after the other books of psalms were published; and so they were placed here all together by him that collected this book.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 1, 2. Saul, or Doeg, was the evil man, and the man of violence: but there were many others who concurred in all the designs formed against the life of David, and who were employed in devising plans for that purpose; as Caiaphas and Judas had many helpers in their machinations against the life of the holy Jesus.

V. 3. 'Slander and calumny must always precede and accompany persecution; because malice itself cannot excite people against a good man as such; to do this he must first be represented as a bad man. What can be said of those who are busied in this manner, but that they are a generation of vipers,' the brood of the old serpent, that grand accuser and calumniator of the brethren; having under their tongues a bag of poison, conveying instant death to the reputation on which they fasten? Thus David was hunted as a rebel, Christ was crucified as a blasphemer, and the primitive Christians were tortured as guilty of incest and murder.' (Horne.)

V. 7. Covered, &c. 'He calleth to God with lively faith, being assured of his mercies: because he had before time proved, that God helped him ever in his dangers.' (1 Sam. xvii. 34—36. 45—50.)

PSALM CXLI.

David earnestly requests the acceptance of his prayers, to be preserved from sinful words, works, and indulgences, 1—4. He desires the reproofs of the righteous, whom he will recompense by his prayers; and hopes to win on his people when afflicted, 5, 6. He complains that his friends were cruelly slain, professes confidence in God, and predicts the fall of the wicked, 7—10.

lated the head, signifies also poison, especially the poison of serpents, which is collected in their heads.

V. 10. 'Their lips, which uttered mischief against others, shall be the means of covering themselves with confusion, when out of their own mouths they shall be judged. Those tongues, which have contributed to set the world on fire, shall be tormented with the hot burning coals of eternal vengeance; and they who, with so much eagerness and diligence, have prepared pits for the destruction of their brethren, shall be cast into a deep and bottomless pit, out of which they will not rise up again any more for ever.' (Horne.)

V. 11. "A lying lip is but for a moment;" it serves a present purpose, and often proves for a while very successful: but at length it defeats its own purposes, and never effects established prosperity. The original is, "A man of tongue;" one who does not bridle his tongue.—The similitude of evil, or punishment, hunting the violent man, as the hounds do the fleeing animal, through all its windings and doublings, till they seize upon it, is very emphatical.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The seed of the old serpent, instigated by their father, will unite subtlety with violence, in executing the mischiefs which they have imagined in their hearts against the children of God: slanders will be devised to cloke their unprovoked malice; they will sharpen their tongues to ruin their reputation, as the serpent's fatal bite envenoms the blood; for "adders' poison is under their lips." Especially they will lay artful stratagems to overthrow their goings, and to betray them into some real or seeming crime, which may furnish them with a plausible handle against them. All this we have seen illustrated in the history of David the type, but it is still more manifested in the history of Christ, the great Antitype. In such circumstances therefore we should especially watch and pray, that the Lord would "hold up our goings in his ways, that our foot-steps slip

"not." He is the Strength of salvation to all, who trust and worship him as their God: he will hear their prayers, and cover their heads in the day of battle: every former deliverance is an earnest of future and final victory: and they may unreservedly pray, that he would not grant the desires of the wicked, nor further their wicked devices, lest they grow more insolent. We may also be confident, that false accusers will, by their lies and perjuries, bring mischief upon themselves, even the burning coals of divine vengeance, which will sink them into the fire and deep pit of hell, to rise no more; except timely repentance prevent the fatal doom. For "an evil speaker shall not be established in the earth: evil shall hunt the violent man to overthrow him." But when the Lord hath proved the faith and patience of his afflicted people, he will maintain their cause, and do them justice against their oppressors. And beyond all doubt, the righteous shall dwell in God's presence, and give him thanks for evermore.

NOTES.

PSALM CXLI. Title. This psalm is generally allowed to have been written by David, when driven among the Philistines, by the implacable persecution of Saul. (Notes, 1 Sam. xxvii.)—'Nobody need wonder, that there are so many prayers founded on the same subject: for that persecution endured long, and they were made upon different occasions, or for different purposes; and David loved to spend his time in such devout meditations.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 2. Or, 'My prayer shall be set before thee; as incense, &c.' When driven from the courts of the Lord and the communion of his people, the Psalmist purposed to be as regular and constant at his devotions, as the priests were in burning incense, and offering the sacrifices morning and evening: and he prayed, that his fervent supplications might be accepted, even as if presented at the sanctuary, being presented with a believing reference to the typical expiation and intercession there made. It is probable, that this psalm was composed, at the time of the morning or evening sacrifice; and that David, (as Daniel afterwards,) offered his prayers with his face towards Zion. The word, however, rendered sacrifice, does not signify the lamb for a burnt-offering every morning and evening, but the meat-offering which accompanied it. (Num. xxviii. 4, 5.) This is supposed by some learned men to have been typical of our Saviour's holy and useful life, by which he "fulfilled all righteousness," and set us "an example that we should follow his steps;" as the lamb slain typified his expiatory sufferings. So that the Psalmist seems to have selected this word, to express his desire that his prayers might be accepted, as the meat-offering at the sanctuary; rather than as the burnt offering, in order the more clearly to exclude the idea of expiation.

V. 3, 4. David, surrounded by idolaters, who would watch all his words and actions, suspect him as a spy or an enemy, or want to draw him into idolatry, besought God to enable him so to bridle his tongue, that he might not give them any advantage against him; and so to govern and rule his heart, that he might not be seduced into any sinful compliances. In such company he feared, lest he should be tempted to trifle, to dissemble, or to speak inconsistently with his character as a zealous worshipper of the true God; or, as some think, lest he should be led to express his sense of the ill usage he had received from Saul in an unbecoming manner, and therefore he prayed for a guard to be placed before his mouth. He was also aware that corrupt examples continually before his eyes might gradually draw him aside; and he prayed that his heart might not be inclined to any evil thing, or to join the impieties and iniquities of the Philistines; and that he might not be tempted by their idolatrous feasts or hospitable entertainments, to eat of such things as were forbidden by the law of God. Incline not, &c. evidently means 'Keep my heart so, that I may not be suffered to incline to evil.' (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5. Jealous of himself in so ensnaring a situation, the Psalmist prayed, that some pious friends might ever be present to reprove him sharply, if he yielded to temptation. This he would take most kindly, sensible that it would neither break his head, nor cause him to hang it down in dejection: but being insinuating and healing, like an excellent oil, it would be very useful to him; and he would requite the benefit by praying for them in their calamities, if he had no other way of expressing his gratitude. Or, This would enable him the more fervently, and as with renewed vigour, to pray against their wickedness, (that of the idolaters,) which he had been almost induced to imitate. Perhaps David obliquely hinted at the slanders of Saul and his party; from which he distinguished the censures of the pious Israelites, who might blame him for going into the land of the Philistines.

V. 6. This verse may mean, according to our translation, that David, foreseeing the ruin of Saul and his party, the present judges of Israel, as if they had been cast from the sides of a rock, or cut in pieces in rocky places by the enemy, without being able to escape; hoped, that the Israelites would then hearken to his salutary admonitions, which they now disregarded. 'The people which followed their wicked rulers in persecuting the prophet, shall repent and turn to God, when they see their wicked rulers punished.' The following is a literal translation: "Their judges have been dismissed in the sides of the rock, and have heard my words, that they were sweet." David mentions his own behaviour to his implacable enemy, whose life he had spared at two several times, when he had it in his power to destroy him. Their judges, or princes, "have been dismissed, in the sides of the rock," when I had them at an advantage, and they only heard me ex- postulate with them in a manner so mild and humble, that even Saul himself was overcome, and—wept. Yet how have my people also been by them most miserably butchered! (Horne.)

V. 7. This probably refers to the slaughter of the hundred and eighty-five priests and their families, by Doeg at Saul's command, because they were supposed to favour David. The bones of this company, murdered on his account, were thrown at the grave's mouth, as plentifully, and as disregarded, as the chips scattered about by one that cleaveth wood upon the ground. In this verse the word sheol certainly means the grave.

V. 9. 'Not only preserve me from the snares, which my persecutors have laid for me; but likewise from the allurements of all other wicked men; especially the idolatrous Philistines among whom I sojourn.'

V. 10. 'David escaped all the snares that were laid for him on every side; he lived to see the death of Saul, who fell in battle with the Philistines, and those Philistines subdued by himself and his subjects.' (Horne.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The believer will maintain communion with his God, wherever he goes; the greater his trials are, the more fervent will his prayers be; and when they are presented through the Saviour's oblation and intercession, they will be as acceptable to God, as the daily sacrifices and burning of incense were of old. We have always need to entreat the Lord to set a watch before the door of our lips; but especially when we are constrained to associate with ungodly men; where we shall continually be urged to speak, and tempted to speak improperly, out of fear, shame, or complaisance; and where we can scarcely speak at all, without giving them some cause of error, prejudice, or offence. If surrounded by such contagious examples, we shall likewise have especial cause to keep our hearts with all diligence, and to pray continually, that they may not be "inclined to any evil thing, or to practise wicked works with men that work iniquity." Our appetites also must be bridled: lest they be bribed by their luxuries, or we be prevailed upon by seducing solicitations, to sanction their excesses or iniquities, by the least approach to inordinate indulgence. If it be our cross to be cast into such a situation, we may expect that the Lord will preserve us in it; though it will require extraordinary watchfulness and constancy in prayer, and we are generally most remiss on such occasions: but if any from carnal motives run into such temptations, they seldom escape unpolluted or unwounded. In all places, however, we should fear sin more than suffering; and rather be desirous to honour God, than to recommend or advance ourselves. Such desires will not only dictate our prayers; but induce us to welcome the rebukes of our heavenly Father, and also the reproofs of our brethren. We should indeed study to profit by the reproaches of our enemies, and by the severe rebukes of those who mean well, but are unskillful: but that reproof, which is given with prudence, meekness, piety, and affection, insinuates, and lubricates like a healing ointment. It causes little pain or irritation, and produces abundant good. And no benefactors are more entitled to our gratitude and our prayers, than reprovers of this character; because none serve us in a more disinterested and self-denying manner. Yet, alas, flatterers are generally more favoured, even by professing Christians; and this plain-dealing is lamentably sunk into disuse, to the unspeakable detriment of true piety! We should be unwearied in our endeavours to do good: those instructive and affectionate words, which sinners despised in their prosperity, may perhaps be attended to in adversity; or when the ruin of ringleaders, or associates in iniquity, concurs in showing them their danger and misery: and we should watch for such opportunities. Nor should any injuries make us reluctant to do good to our opponents: even though they have wasted the church, as king Saul, and as Saul of Tarsus did, till the bones of the Lord's ministers and people lie scattered abroad, as the chips around him who heweth wood. Indeed, if we be not exposed to such calamities, our bones will soon lie scattered at the mouth of the grave; and others will moralize over them, as we are wont to do, when we traverse a burying ground, and behold an opened grave. Let us then lift our eyes unto God the Lord, and trust in him that our souls shall not then be left destitute: let us entreat him to rescue us from the snares of Satan and of all the workers of iniquity, that we may escape and be blessed for ever, whilst the wicked fall into their own nets and perish.

NOTES.

PSALM CXLII. Title. On one occasion David, driven from the court of Achish, with only a very small company, hid himself in the cave of Adullam; where at length he was joined by a considerable number of adherents: (1 Sam. xxii. 1, 2.) On another, he was hidden in a cave when Saul and his army came to seek for him; thus he was in extreme danger, till Saul, by inadvertently entering the cave, put himself in his power, and gave him an opportunity of showing his determination not to injure his prince, and also of escaping for the present. (1 Sam. xxiv.) It is not certain, to which of these events this psalm belongs. But, however that may be, David seems to have formed the substance of his prayer, in the extremity of his danger, into a psalm, when he had obtained deliverance: though some think that it ought to be rendered in the present tense, as the very prayer which he made in the cave.

V. 1—3. 'Though destitute of human help, I will not despair of safety; but with more fervent cries implore the divine succour. I will lay before God all the sad thoughts which perplex my heart; and representing the miserable straits wherein I am, expose myself to him as an object of his pity.'—'Now that I am utterly at a loss, and ready to faint away in the confusion of my thoughts; thou knowest very well a way for my escape: though by the intelligence they,' (Saul and his party,) hold with my enemies, they have blocked up all the passages which I am acquainted with, and laid ambushes for me in every road.' V. 4. The original is in the imperative, "Look thou on my right hand, &c." Some consider it, as a prayer to God to look on the extremity of his case, others as a kind of soliloquy. "Look about thee, O my soul, if thou canst spy any hope of relief from thy best and most powerful friends. There are none of them that dare to own thee, nor do I know whither to flee for safety." (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 6. "O let my importunate cry prevail for some relief, which will come most seasonably in this extreme necessity. Rescue me now, that I may not fall into the hands of my persecutors, who are every way, (except in these cries unto and confidence in thee,) much too strong for me." (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 7. The cave in which David was hidden, was like a prison to confine him, till Saul should come and put him to death ; unless God mercifully delivered him, according to his word, of which he did not allow himself to doubt.
 Nay, he anticipated the season, when his grateful praises would attract the notice of all the pious Israelites ; and when he should be as much surrounded by admiring multitudes, as he was now shunned by all. In this he was a type of Christ, as deserted in the garden ; and as exalted to be a Prince and Saviour.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

There can be no situation so distressing, perilous, or disgraceful, in which faith will not derive comfort from God by fervent prayer. In our great perplexities, when our spirits are overwhelmed by distress, and filled with confusion and discouragement, and when we see snares laid for us on every side, we may reflect with comfort that "the LORD knoweth our path ;" and if we aim to walk in his way, he will protect and guide us, and extricate us from every danger and difficulty. Indeed few men choose to know their afflicted and persecuted acquaintance, which might expose them to expense, inconvenience, and peril :
 and refuge may in this sense fail us, and no one appear to care for our lives or souls. But the LORD will be the Refuge of his people on earth, and their Portion in heaven, that "land of the living." Thus he delivered David from his powerful persecutors, after he was brought very low ;

he raised him from the cave, in which he seemed to be imprisoned as a condemned criminal for execution : he advanced him to the throne, compassed him about with the righteous, dealt bountifully with him, and turned his complaining prayers into joyful praises. Thus he raised the crucified Redeemer from the prison of the grave to the throne of glory, and made Him head over all things, for his church. Thus the poor convinced sinner, when every other refuge fails, and he is shut up under sin, cries for help, and is brought forth out of prison to praise the LORD, in the company of his redeemed people : and thus every believer will be finally delivered from this evil world, from sin, and death ; that, with mutual congratulations, the whole company of the redeemed may rejoice, and praise their God and Saviour for evermore.

NOTES.

PSALM CXLIII. V. 1. 'There are passages which incline us to apply this psalm to David's flight from Absalom ; for then he had most reason to fear, lest God should deal with him according to his sins, which he de-precates with such a deep sense of his unworthiness, that it hath made this to be numbered among the penitential psalms, and it is the last of them.' (Bp. Patrick.) David had the faithfulness of God to depend on, according to the promises made to him by name, and to Solomon, and his posterity by him, notwithstanding his personal unworthiness ; and his cause was righteous, when called to withstand Absalom's unnatural rebellion.

V. 2. The Psalmist, having appealed to the justice of God to decide betwixt him and his enemies, was reminded, that neither he, nor any other man, could stand in judgment before God, according to the tenor of his righteous law. 'The thoughts of such a trial are enough to appal the soul of the best man living, to make his flesh tremble, and all his bones shake, as if he stood at the foot of mount Sinai, and beheld JEHOVAH ready to break forth upon him in the flame of devouring fire.' (Horne.) 'If thou shouldst proceed according to the rigour of thy law, the best man living, (much less so great a sinner as I,) will not be acquitted at thy tribunal.' (Bp. Patrick.) The connexion of this verse, with the preceding and the following verses, in which it is evident the Psalmist was referring the cause between him and his adversaries to the decision of the just Judge of the world, renders it peculiarly important in the argument, concerning a sinner's justification before God. (Note, Rom. iii.)

V. 3. Absalom, Ahithophel, and their zealous adherents, pursued David with unrelenting malice; they drove him from his city and palace, and at once turned his singular prosperity into desolation, almost like death: as a warrior at one stroke beats his enemy to the ground. Thus he was driven in to obscure corners in disgrace and distress: and at the same time the consciousness of guilt and inward disconsolation and temptation, served to shut him up, as in a dark dungeon; while the triumphs of his enemies made his cause to be considered as lost, so that he was no more noticed by the Israelites in general, than if he had been long dead.

V. 4. (Note, cxlii. 3.)

V. 5. The Psalmist may be supposed, in this extremity, to have revolved in his mind all his former escapes and deliverances from the time when "the LORD delivered him from the paw of the lion and the bear," from the sword of Goliath, and the javelin of Saul, through all his subsequent persecutions, and every danger, till the time when he composed the psalm. But, it is also probable, that he meditated on all the displays of the power, truth, and mercy of God to his people, from the beginning of the world; in order to encourage his drooping hope, and revive his desponding soul.

V. 6. "I long for relief, and expect it with as eager a desire, as the parched ground does the refreshing shower." (Bp. Patrick.) "The joy of God's salvation," however, seems to have been more prominent in the Psalmist's mind, than any outward deliverance, when he used this most striking similitude.

V. 8. "Though this night be sad: yet let me hear—better news—in the morning." (Bp. Patrick.) Perhaps this was written when David heard of Ahithophel's counsel to slay him. (Notes, iii. 2 Sam. xvii.) In this emergency he earnestly lifted up his soul to God, and prayed to be directed what methods to adopt for his safety; or rather how to act in consistency with his duty.

V. 10. "Whose guidance I beseech, as well as defence, that I may do nothing, (no not for my preservation,) but what is perfectly agreeable to thy laws." (Bp. Patrick.) Thy Spirit. When we consider the darkness and pollution of the sinner's heart, and recollect how men resist the Holy Spirit; and how even believers often quench his emotions, grieve him by their perverseness, and pollute his temple by their sins; and also reflect, that he not only enters the soul, as a Sanctifier to prepare us for future happiness; but as a Comforter, and as the first-fruits of that happiness; and how he perseveres in his work of love and power, notwithstanding our folly and ingratitude: we shall perceive a peculiar propriety in this epithet of "good," as applied to God the Spirit. His condescension, compassion, and kindness can be equalled by nothing but the bleeding love of Emmanuel, and the mercy of God the Father in sending us such a Redeemer and Sanctifier. The goodness of the Spirit formed a very encouraging plea to the broken hearted Psalmist, who, conscious of his unworthiness, could scarcely hope, that this divine Comforter, whom he had grieved, would return any more to rejoice his drooping heart.

V. 11, 12. "These verses should be rendered in the future; and then the Psalm will end as usual, with an act of faith and assurance, that all those mercies which have been asked shall be attained." (Horne.) "Thou wilt quicken me, &c." (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The believer has not only the faithfulness, but the righteousness, of God engaged in his behalf; because he is made the righteousness of God in Christ Jesus: much more then may he be confident, that he has justice on his side in those causes, which are pending betwixt him and his persecutors before the supreme Judge. But he will not forget, that in himself and in his best actions, he is a sinner, and that he cannot be justified at God's tribunal by his own obedience : and this consideration will keep him as a humble penitent, pleading guilty, crying for mercy, living by faith, and perceiving more and more preciousness in Christ, to the end of his days. Nor need the trembling sinner who hath lately discovered that he cannot stand in judgment before God, be discouraged on that account : for the greatest of saints have confessed the same. But what must be the presumption and delusion of those who despise free grace, and expect heaven as the wages of their scanty formal services ! Nay, some of them have even arrogantly thought of meriting for others also !—The justified believer, having peace with God, will experience the enmity of the world, and the temptations of Satan. This enemy at least, will persecute our souls ; and he often smites our life to the ground by his seducing and discouraging suggestions. When he can prevail with us to commit sin, and the Lord is provoked to hide his face ; he next insinuates that God will no more be gracious ; and thus he causes us to indulge despondency and hard thoughts of God, and we dwell in darkness as if we were cast off to perish. But meditation and prayer will recover us from these distresses : whilst we muse on the works of God, we shall be encouraged to hope in him ; and then the mourning soul strives to return to him, as the infant stretches out its hands towards an indulgent mother, and thirsts for his consolations as the parched ground for refreshing rain. And if the imminent peril of death renders men vehement in calling out for speedy relief ; much more will the believer call upon God, to hear him speedily, when his spirit faileth, and through the hiding of his face, he seems like them that go down in the pit. But this night of distress and discouragement shall usher in a morning of consolation and praise. They who trust in the Lord, shall hear of his loving-kindness : and he will " cause those to know the way wherein they should walk, " who lift up their souls unto him." Let us then flee to the Lord to hide us from every enemy ; entreating him to teach us to do his will, and to guide us by his good Spirit, in the straight way of holiness, to the land of perfect righteousness and peace. And the more we are slandered and persecuted, the more fervently should we pray that we may not only find peace and comfort, but that " by well-doing we may put to silence the ignorance of foolish men." Nor will the good Spirit of our God disdain to be the Guide, Sanctifier, and Comforter of poor sinners, who seek these blessings in the Redeemer's name. The Lord counts all as his enemies who are enemies to his people ; and in mercy to their souls he will cut off all that afflict and injure them : but we should especially seek the destruction of our sins, our worst enemies, that we may be more devotedly God's servants ; and then his righteousness and mercy concur in securing an answer to our prayers for complete and eternal deliverance.

NOTES.

PSALM CXLIV. V. 1. This psalm was no doubt written by David, after his accession to the throne over all Israel ; and when he had gained some of his first victories over the neighbouring nations : but before he had finished his wars against them. " Blessed be the Lord my " Strength," " who of a poor shepherd has made me a " valiant warrior and mighty conqueror."

V. 2. My goodness. The God on whose goodness and " mercy I depend ;" or, My supreme Good ; or, The " Author of all that is good in me." (Notes, 2 Sam. xxii. 2, 3.) " My Deliverer unto me," (the literal translation,) " for the prophet cannot satisfy himself with any words."

V. 3, 4. What is, &c. (Note, &c. Psalm viii.) " Man " is now become like vanity, or instability itself ; his days " are fleeting and transient as a shadow, which glides over " the earth, vanishes, and is seen no more." Such was " human nature : but the Son of God has taken it upon " himself, rendered it immortal, and exalted it to heaven." (Horne.)

V. 5—8. The psalmist perceived, that war was again preparing against him on every side; and the number and power of his enemies were so formidable, that, like a dreadful inundation, they seemed ready to bear down and swallow up all before them. But they were “strange children,” aliens to Israel; so that their “mouth spake vanity, and their right hand was a right hand of iniquity;” they professed to be worshippers of idols, and blasphemed the God of Israel, and they employed themselves in working wickedness; nay, if they made any league, and confirmed it by giving the right hand, as a token of amity, they made no scruple of breaking it. David therefore expected, that God would appear for him against these idolaters, with similar tokens of his presence and power, as Israel had witnessed in Egypt, at the Red Sea, and at mount Sinai. (Notes, 2 Sam. viii. 3—13. xxii.)—The deliverance and victories, that David expected and experienced from the Lord’s immediate interposition, were typical of the Redeemer’s resurrection and exaltation; in which the miraculous power of God was gloriously manifested; and also of his victories over those that oppose the universal establishment of his kingdom, and of his “putting all his enemies under his feet;” of which event such passages may be considered as in some respects prophetic.

V. 10. The preservation and success even of idolatrous princes are, in Scripture, ascribed to God. “The Lord strengthened Eglon against Israel.” “By Naaman the Lord had given deliverance to Syria.” “Nebuchadnezzar my servant, will I bring against this land.”—“The God of heaven hath given thee,” (Nebuchadnezzar,) “a kingdom, power, and strength, and glory; and where-soever the children of men dwell, the beasts of the field and the fowls of the heaven, hath he given into thine hand, and hath made thee ruler over them all.”—

“Thus saith the Lord to his anointed, to Cyrus whose right hand I have holden to subdue nations before him, &c.” (Is. xlii. 27, 28. xlv. 1—6.) “Though wicked kings be called God’s servants, for as much as he useth them to execute his judgments: yet David, because of God’s promise, and they that rule godly, are properly so called; because they serve not their own affections, but set forth God’s glory.”

V. 11. The word Rescue, in the old translation, is more expressive than the term Rid, for which it is exchanged—Right hand. “When they shake hands with others, as if they were their friends, they intend thereby to deceive them. (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 12—15. The prosperity of Israel, according to the promises of the national covenant, was one great end for which David was raised to the throne; and in all his undertakings and successes he kept this in view. If the surrounding idolaters were subdued, Israel would be at peace; and being united under the equitable administration of a pious king, they would be kept close to the worship of God, and by his blessing they would multiply exceedingly. Their sons would grow, as plants in a fruitful soil, in vigour and courage, to be the stability of the country; and their daughters, prudent, virtuous, healthful, industrious, and amiable, fitted to fill the important relations of wives and mothers, would be the ornament of their families, and of those into which they were married, and the bond of union betwixt them; as polished corner-stones both beautify and connect together the parts of a magnificent structure. Having peace abroad and harmony at home, their land, being well cultivated, might be expected to be very productive in corn, wine, oil, and every thing valuable, and their cattle to multiply exceedingly. No invader would break in among them; none would go forth into captivity, or be induced to emigrate; nor would there be any complaining of oppression or penury in their streets. These were the blessings engaged to Israel whilst they adhered to the service of JEHOVAH: and of which David hoped to put them in possession: in the ordinary course of providence they are generally conferred upon nations, where princes and people unite in maintaining the worship of God and obedience to his laws: and they are also typical of those blessings which the Son of David bestows upon his faithful subjects. “If God give not

PSALM CXLV.

David zealously praises the greatness, power, goodness, and mercy of God, 1—10. He celebrates the glory of his kingdom, and the bounty of his providence, 11—16 : his justice, holiness, regard to the prayers of the upright, and care of those that love him ; and his vengeance upon the wicked, 17—21.

‘ to his children all these blessings, yet he recompenseth them with better things.’

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

If men become eminent for those things to which they were not regularly educated, and for which they have wanted many advantages ; they should be the more deeply sensible that God himself hath been their Teacher. But though courage, strength, and military skill are gifts of the Creator, and all success is from him : yet they are seldom so used, as to warrant the successful warrior to say, “ The LORD my Strength hath taught my hands to war, and my fingers to fight : ” for, alas ! too frequently the great murderer from the beginning instigates ambitious, revengeful, and rapacious men, to destroy their fellow-creatures without cause. But they who are really disposed to give God the glory of their endowments and success, will seek grace from him to make a proper use of them ; and praise him no less as “ their Goodness,” than as their Fortress, their Protector, and the Giver of their authority and prosperity.—Happy are they whom the Lord teaches to fight the good fight of faith, and to whom he gives that noblest victory and rule, the conquest and dominion over their own spirits ! In the highest earthly exaltation, they will still recollect, how mean, sinful, and vile they are in themselves ; they will be filled with admiring gratitude for the condescension of the great God to such rebellious sinners, and for every instance of his regard to them ; and thus they will be preserved from self-importance and presumption in prosperity. They will not forget that “ man is like unto vanity, his days are as a shadow, that passeth away ; ” that the transition from a throne to the grave, or even to the depths of hell, is easy and frequent ; that deliverance from the wrath to come, and a crown of unfading glory, are the most important concerns ; and that living to the honour of God, and the benefit of his church, is far more desirable than all human exaltation and renown. Even in this life, success and authority rather expose men to trials and conflicts than secure exemption from them. But whilst we are doing our duty in our proper place, we may depend on God to defend and prosper us : and when our enemies are infidel, impious, or licentious, our encouragement to hope in him for help against them may proportionably increase. He, who bows the heavens and comes down, and touches the mountains and causes them to smoke, to melt, to remove, can find innumerable ways to confound the devices, dissolve the confederacies, and scatter the forces of his most potent foes ; to deliver his people from dangers as imminent as if they were sinking in the depths of the ocean ; and thus to turn all their fears and prayers into new songs of joyful praise. He giveth temporal deliverances to kings, and continueth, or restoreth, their health in answer to the prayers, or for the benefit, of their people : and he alone can give them eternal salvation, which they need as much as the meanest of their subjects, whilst they are commonly placed more out of the way of it ; and yet to be saved from the hurtful sword, or the wasting sickness, without being delivered from the dominion of sin and the wrath to come, is no very enviable advantage. The higher any one is placed in society, the more entirely ought he to seek the public good, in preference to his own personal emolument or indulgence. No war ought to be undertaken, or victories desired, but for the sake of securing peace ; the blessings of which are far more valuable than the most brilliant successes ; to say nothing of the thousands that are slain in war, and too generally die in their sins. Wise, equitable, and pious princes and magistrates conduce much to the prosperity of nations : such blessings we should pray for, and when granted we should return thanks for them : as well as for our liberty, plenty, and other public benefits. It is a very pleasant sight to behold a nation increasing in population ; families brought up in industry, honesty, and plenty, and fitted for the several stations in public and domestic life ; not cut off by war, or wasted by famine or pestilence ; and when all manner of abundance is stored in our garners, and clothes our fields and pastures. In many of these things we are a happy people : yet, alas ! our numerous youths do not generally afford a pleasing prospect. Too many of the young men, of all ranks in this favoured land, grow up noxious plants, being early debauched in their principles and morals, and justly to be denominated infidel, profane, licentious, and dissipated ; contracting and disseminating both mental and bodily diseases ; and prepared to communicate vice, and ruin, and enfeebled constitutions, to the next generation. The daughters of the land indeed are sufficiently polished with exterior beauty and embellishment, and every superficial accomplishment : but few of them have the polishing of a corner-stone, as qualified to be the ornament of families, the cement of society, and a blessing to the land and to the next generation, by an attentive, judicious, and virtuous performance of the duties of domestic life ; and still fewer are possessed of that adorning which the word of God most recommends. Whilst we abound in luxury and excess, and are free from irruptions of invaders, and the oppression of tyrants, there is still much complaining in our streets : yea, much extreme distress ; through the vice, sloth, and extravagance, which prevail among the lower ranks in society, and through the enormous encouragement given by the affluent to those worthless minions that minister to their amusements, decorations, or excesses, attended with the neglect of the honest and industrious poor. Thus in proportion as we do not adhere to the worship and service of God, we cease to be a happy people, notwithstanding all our advantages. But there is a considerable remnant of another character ; the subjects of the Son of David ; who share the blessings of his authority and the fruits of his victories ; and are a happy people, because "they have the LORD for their "God." They dwell among the ungodly, as among "strange children, whose mouth speaketh of vanity, and "whose right hand worketh iniquity: but they desire to be preserved from the contagion of their example. Their happiness is not placed in outward prosperity, nor even in flourishing families: but their endeavours are used, and their prayers are offered daily, that their sons may in their youth be planted and grow up in the courts of the Lord; that their daughters may be an ornamental part of God's spiritual temple, and be fitted in due time to be mothers in Israel, to train up a godly seed for the ensuing generation; that the number of Christians may increase, as the flocks in the fertile pastures of Canaan; that they who labour in the word and doctrine, may be strong in the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, (1 Cor. ix. 9, 10;) that the good seed of the word may yield a vast increase; that persecutions, heresies, and divisions may be terminated: and that the church may be in peace, and prosper, without any murmurings, envyings, or contentions, to disgrace and weaken the cause of Christianity. These objects may we all ever keep in view, that, as one united phalanx, all who love Christ, may oppose the irruption of infidelity and iniquity, and promote the diffusion of truth and righteousness: for "Happy is that people that is in such a case; yea, happy

 "is that people whose God is the LORD."

NOTES.

PSALM CXLV. Title. From this psalm to the end of the book, we find unmixed praise and thanksgiving, without one complaint or petition. Probably David composed all these psalms towards the close of his life, when, as the setting sun breaks forth from behind intervening clouds, he shone forth and set in mild majesty and splendour: anticipating the employment and felicity of heaven, as he approached the mansions of the blessed. The psalm is composed alphabetically, each verse beginning with one of the Hebrew letters in order, except that nun is omitted,

7 They shall ¹ abundantly utter the memory of thy great goodness, and shall sing of thy righteousness.

8 The ² LORD is gracious, and full of compassion; slow to anger, and ³ of great mercy.

9 The LORD is ⁴ good to all: and his tender mercies are over all his works.

10 All thy works shall praise thee, O
 LORD; ⁵ and thy saints shall bless thee.

11 They shall speak of ⁶ the glory of thy kingdom, and talk of thy power;

12 To ⁷ make known to the sons of men his mighty acts, and the glorious majesty of his kingdom.

13 Thy ⁸ kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and thy dominion endureth throughout all generations.

ceedingly attentive to the wants and sufferings even of animals, according to their several tribes; and requires men to be so. (Marg. Ref.) All his creatures, according to their several natures, in one way or other, though unconsciously or involuntarily, subserve the display of his glory: but his saints, his redeemed people, who have obtained his mercy and devoted themselves to his service, are the royal priesthood in this august temple of the visible creation, who with admiring grateful hearts, zealously offer him the spiritual sacrifices of adoring praise and thanksgiving. They are the subjects of the mediatorial kingdom of the Redeemer on earth, and heirs of the kingdom in heaven, "which God "hath prepared for them that love him:" and it is their chief business and pleasure to celebrate the power and glory of that kingdom, which are also the grand subject of their praises. Thus, by their means, the sons of men, who had before not known the works and kingdom of God, become acquainted with them: and in this manner the kingdom of God comes, and is set up more diffusively on earth, and perpetuated from generation to generation, and will be so till the end of time; when, translated to heaven, it will endure for ever and ever. The Septuagint here adds another verse, (probably to complete the number of verses according to the Hebrew alphabet,) which is not found in the original. "The LORD is faithful to all his words, and "holy in all his works." The sentiment in this verse is indeed entirely scriptural; but it so much resembles the seventeenth, that it is supposed by the best critics not to be genuine.

V. 14. "JEHOVAH is the Supporter of all that are falling, and Refresher of all that are dejected." "Who "being in misery and affliction would faint and fall away, "if God did not uphold them: and therefore they ought to reverence him that reigneth in heaven, and suffer themselves to be governed by him." This is also a direction to those who are ready to fall before temptation, or to sink under affliction, where to apply for help and comfort; even to "that God who comforteth those that are cast down."

V. 15, 16. (Note, civ. 27-30.)

V. 17. Perfect justice, truth, purity, wisdom, and love, invariably govern all the dispensations and works of God. And the more any man studies them in humble piety, the fuller conviction of this leading and satisfying truth will he receive.

V. 18. "It is our happiness to have a King, that is not, "like earthly princes, difficult of access; but one of whom

"his meanest subject may at any time obtain an audience, and be certain of having his request granted, if it be made "in truth," without wavering and without hypocrisy, with humble confidence and unwearied constancy; "expecting salvation from God, from none but him, and "from him only in the way of duty and obedience." (Horne.) —This is a just description of a right state of heart; but the Psalmist seems to have intended the encouragement of all sincere suppliants, (as distinguished from hypocrites,) however low and imperfect their attainments were.

V. 19, 20. They that call on God in truth fear him; and he will fulfil their desires; as they desire what he has promised. Thus they will learn to love him, and become conscious that they do love him: and, amidst all trials and temptations, the almighty God preserves those that love him. But the wicked, the impenitent, whether profane or hypocritical, he will destroy.

V. 21. "All men ought to praise God to eternity, and "may all do this." The Psalmist thus concludes, as he had begun; except that he here called on others to do what himself had before determined on.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Such as, under troubles and temptations, abound in fervent prayer, shall in due season abound in grateful praise, which is the genuine language of holy joy. We can never extol our glorious God and Saviour in an adequate manner: we should therefore exert all our powers, and make new efforts to bless his name every day; and we may thus be delightfully employed for ever and ever, without exhausting the infinitely copious subject. For "the great Head of the "church is the King of all the earth, yea, he is great, and "greatly to be praised; and his greatness is unsearchable." Animated by our glorious theme, we should communicate all we have learned of his perfections and his works to our children; that when we join the songs of the church triumphant, the solemn service on earth may not be suspended for a moment; but that "one generation may praise his "works unto another, and declare his mighty acts." Whether our sphere be extensive or contracted, we should in it be continually "speaking of the glorious honour of his "majesty;" especially of his wondrous work of redemption; in order to stir up other men to speak of his power and terrible acts, whilst we declare his greatness. For nei-

PSALM CXLVI.

The Psalmist resolves to praise God, while he had any being, 1, 2. He dissuades from trusting in man, 3, 4. He encourages confidence in God, from a view of his power and goodness, as displayed in all his works, 5—10.

* PRAISE ye the LORD. * Praise the LORD, O my soul.

ther Egypt's desolating plagues, nor the destruction of the devoted Canaanites, so proclaim the terror of the avenging justice of our God, as the cross of Christ does to the enlightened mind. But though we endeavour to make sinners know the terror of the Lord, that they may flee from the wrath to come; yet we should still more aim to lead them into the experience of his mercy, that "they may abundantly utter the memory of his great goodness, and sing "of his righteousness:" for in the salvation of Christ we see it harmonize with mercy, and perceive that a just God is also gracious, full of compassion, and slow to anger. Indeed, "the LORD is good to all, and his tender mercies are "over all his works;" and even impenitent sinners on earth are living monuments of his patience, and of his goodness to his enemies. All his works show forth his praises: but his saints bless his name with joyful hearts, and render him the reasonable service of love and gratitude. Being brought into his kingdom, as governed by the divine Redeemer from his mediatorial throne, they delight to discourse of its glory and to talk of his power. The perfections of their King, the honour of God the Father in his salvation, the privileges and character of his subjects, and their impregnable security; the reasonableness of his laws, and the mercy and equity of his administration; the favour he hath shown to rebels who submit to him, the benefits they have received, the inheritance prepared for them, and the price paid for their ransom, form their favourite topics. Fain would they make known to all the sons of men his mighty acts and the glorious majesty of his kingdom: that none might longer refuse submission to so gracious a prince, whose authority is established to all generations. The Lord's condescension likewise excites their liveliest gratitude: he regardeth the mean and the vile; he upholdeth all such as feel themselves falling into sin and misery, and apply to him for help; and he raiseth up all those that are bowed down with conscious guilt or deep distress. All creatures wait upon him, and are satisfied with meat in due season; and he saith to his believing poor, "Your Father knoweth what "things you have need of." His justice and purity are always exercised in full perfection, whether he save or punish; yet he most delighteth that sinners should repent and live. He is therefore accessible at all times and in all places, to the most guilty of our fallen race; and he is nigh to hear, to pardon, and to save, all that call upon him in truth; so that none who hear the Gospel, are excluded from its bless-sings, but profane despisers, careless transgressors, and hypocrites. "For he will fulfil the desire of them that fear "him: he will hear their cry, and will help them." And having taught them to love his name and his holy ways, he will preserve them from the destruction of the wicked, who shall perish for ever. May we then fear his wrath, and seek his grace: may we love his name, and walk in his ways: then shall we speak from a full heart, whilst our lips utter his praise; and whilst we desire that "all flesh "should bless his holy name for ever and ever."

NOTES.

PSALM CXLVI. V. 1. The Septuagint and the vulgate Latin ascribe this psalm to Haggai and Zechariah; from an opinion, perhaps, that it suited the times of those prophets; when the Jews found little encouragement to trust in the kings of Persia; but when, simply trusting in God, they were prospered. It seems, however, to have been written by David towards the close of his reign.

V. 2. While, &c. No doubt the following stanza gives the genuine meaning of the Psalmist:

' I'll praise my Maker with my breath;
' And when my voice is lost in death,
' Praise shall employ my noblest powers:
' My days of praise shall ne'er be past
' While life and thought and being last;
' And immortality endures.' (Watts.)

V. 3. The Son, &c. If he, who commonly styled himself the Son of Man, had not also been the Son of God, he must have been included in this general dissuasive: but on the contrary, all the particulars mentioned in the subsequent part of the psalm, were remarkably verified in him. — 'Earthly princes, if they have the will, often want the power, even to protect their friends. And should they want neither will nor power to advance them: yet still all depends upon the breath in their nostrils, which, perhaps at the very critical moment goeth forth, they return to their earth; and all the thoughts of those, who hoped to rise by their means, fall into the same grave, and are buried with them for ever.' (Horne.)

V. 5. 'He, and he alone, is the truly happy man, who expects help from the mighty God who fed Jacob all his life long (Gen. xlviii. 15:) who trusts in him that is the Lord of the world, and hath made him his Friend so much, that he can call him his God'. (Bp. Patrick.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In heaven when one Hallelujah closes, another commences: and sometimes the believer on earth is so carried above his fears, sorrows, and sins, as to emulate the incessant thanksgivings of the saints in light. If we desire to praise the Lord while we live, as our most delightful occupation, we shall certainly praise him “ while we have any being,” even to all eternity. With these glorious prospects before our eyes, how mean do the pursuits of ambition, or connexions with the great, seem to us! and how needful doth it appear to dissuade men from this common but destructive idolatry! The fickleness, jealousies, selfishness, and weakness of man, and the intrigues and cabals of courts, render all dependence on princes delusory, even as to this present world. But were this dependence as stable as it is slippery, the uncertainty of life must expose to perpetual anxieties and disappointments all those who confide in such dying patrons. How little then could the friendship of all the princes of the earth do for us, in respect of judgment and the eternal world! “ Happy is he” alone, “ who hath the God of Jacob for his help, and whose hope is in the Lord his God.” He who “ made the heaven, and earth, the sea, and all that therein is,” cannot want power to bless us; and his goodness is illustrious in every part of his providential government. But lest we should question his love to sinners, or his eternal truth and faithfulness to his word, behold the God of heaven assumes our human flesh, that he may become our Salvation! The eternal and coequal Son of God becomes the Son of man! Not to be without help, as the other children of men are, but to bring effectual help and eternal salvation unto us. And though he expired upon the cross for our sins, and was laid in the grave: yet his thoughts of love did not then perish, but he arose again to accomplish them; and he reigneth in Zion, her Lord and King, to all generations, to the praise and glory of God the Father; and when we trust in Emmanuel, then our faith and hope are rested on the God of Jacob. (1 Pet. i. 21.) To evince, that he was the Creator and Lord of all, when in his state of humiliation on earth; he rescued those who were oppressed by Satan, and executed judgment on that oppressor; he created food to bestow on the hungering multitudes; he opened the eyes of those who had been born blind; he raised up those who were bowed down with disease; and he showed himself the effectual Friend of the widow and of the destitute. But all this was only a specimen and an emblem of what he is doing every day. He still continually proclaims and grants “ deliverance to the captives, and the opening of the prison to those that are bound” in the chains of sin and Satan. He opens the eyes of our understandings, and raises up those who are bowed down with a load of conscious guilt, or by great distress of soul: he feeds those who hunger for salvation, with the Bread of life; and he is the constant Friend of the poor in spirit, of the destitute and helpless. In short, he loveth the righteous, and their righteousness is in and from him; but the way of the wicked he turneth upside down: and whilst he doeth these things by his grace, his providence ordereth all things for the good of those who trust and love him. Let sinners then flee to him; and let believers rejoice in him, as their gracious and covenanted Friend: and as “ the Lord shall reign for ever, even our God to all generations,” let us without ceasing excite each other to praise his holy name.

deed many expressions in it favour the supposition that it was composed as a song of praise for the restoration of the Jews to Jerusalem and their own land; but it seems better suited to the times of Nehemiah, when the walls were rebuilt, and the state re-established, than to the unsettled condition of the newly returned captives, when Haggai and Zechariah prophesied to them. For in their days, it could scarcely be said, that the Lord built up Jerusalem, and he had not then "strengthened the bars of her gates," (13) as they were not set up till long afterwards. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. He comforts us after our long sorrow, which 'had in a manner broken our hearts: and hath in some measure repaired our breaches, which like a festering wound, (Is. i. 5, 6,) endangered the life of our nation.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 4. 'Though it seem to man incredible, that God should assemble his church, being so dispersed; yet no thing can be too hard for him, that can number and name all the stars.' This thought naturally arose from the dispersed state of the Jews after the captivity, and was applicable to the Lord's gathering them into their own land. (Am. ix. 9.) 'He who does this (number and name the stars,) cannot be ignorant of the circumstances and situation of his elect.' (Horne.)

But 'he delights to give those his assistance who worshipping him devoutly fear to offend him; and having no help in themselves, nor any earthly refuge to flee to, depend, notwithstanding, with a steadfast faith on his infinite mercy.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 12-14. The Jews celebrated the dedication of the wall, (when it had been rebuilt, and the gates of it set up, under the pious care of Nehemiah,) with loud and earnest thanksgivings to God; (Notes, Neh. xii. 27-43.) and they were encouraged in future to hope confidently for peace and plenty. The last clause is literally, "He shall satisfy thee with the fat of wheat."

V. 15-18. Till the Lord's time came, all the efforts of the Jews to recover liberty or prosperity were as unavailing, as the skill and power of man are to prevent the effects of frost and snow: but when he gave the command, every heart was speedily disposed to favour them; as the snow and ice melt, and the waters flow, when he sends a thaw, warm sun-beams, and a southern breeze: 'What the sun is to the world, the same is Christ to the church. When 'the heart of man turns away from him, then darkness succeeds to light; then faith fails, and all its fair productions wither, and the fertilizing streams of charity are 'frozen to the bottom.' 'But when he sendeth out his word, and bloweth with his Spirit: then faith revives, 'the hearts of men are warmed, and their understandings 'illuminated.' (Horne.) The snow is here compared to wool, and the ice to morsels: and it is well known that the snow keeps the ground warm and assists vegetation: so that, perhaps the ice, or hailstones are compared to morsels, not only from the solid form which they assume, but because of the nourishing and fertilizing effects which the frost produceth upon the ground.

V. 19, 20. The pious Jews, when returned from their dispersions among idolaters, would be more impressed with the value of their sacred oracles and other special advantages, than they were who had never witnessed such scenes of darkness and ignorance.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The display of the glory of the divine perfections was intended in all the works of God; and to celebrate his praises forms the most suitable return for his benefits, of which we are capable. It is therefore both reasonable and acceptable, pleasant and becoming, for us to abound in this blessed work; 'which is the offspring of gratitude, and the expression of love; the elevation of the soul and the antepast of heaven; its own reward in this life, and an introduction to the felicities of the next.' (Horne.) The continued care of God over his chosen city, and in gathering his people Israel from their various captivities and dispersions, to dwell and worship at Jerusalem, were emblems of his care of his church, the city of the living God; of his gathering poor outcast sinners by his grace, to dwell there on earth; and of his bringing them all at length to his holy habitation in heaven. The contrast between the majesty and the mercy of our God should never be overlooked. Whilst "he telleth the number of the "stars," he condescendeth to hear the poor broken-hearted sinner, and to heal by his consolations his wounded spirit. His greatness, power, and wisdom are infinite; and he displays his justice in crushing to the earth the haughtiest and mightiest rebels: yet he lifteth up the meek from their dejection and abject misery, to the comfort of his favour here, and to the throne of glory hereafter. He provides for all creatures, by means worthy of himself: and whilst he feeds the young ravens who cry unto him, he gives a pledge that he will not leave destitute his praying people. He delighteth not in those things in which sinners confide and glory: but his delight is in them who conscientiously fear and serve him, hoping in his mercy alone for pardon and acceptance. These are the inhabitants of Zion, who praise his name: he is their Protector, and will bless them and their children, with spiritual peace and abundant supplies of every good thing; whilst they who trust in chariots and horses, or in their own agility, strength, wisdom, courage, or righteousness, will sink into penury, misery, and contempt.—When the Lord speaks, all nature prepares for prompt obedience. At his command the snow and the hoar-frost irresistibly cover the earth; nothing can withstand his piercing and congealing cold; the rivers are arrested in their course, and the works of men are suspended; nor can any human power remove the obstruction. But JEHOVAH again gives the word—the gentler breezes blow, the snow and ice melt, the waters flow, and all reverts to its former course. Let us then consider how unable we are to stand before the indignation of the Lord: let us be thankful, that he moderates the continuance of the winter, and renders it useful to the earth: let us bless him, if abundance of all things needful renders us free from the miseries which many suffer during that inclement season; and let us learn to contribute liberally to their relief. Let us also expect from his power things impracticable to all others. He can comfort and sanctify, when every human effort hath proved unsuccessful: he can soften and melt the most obdurate heart; and bring the rich and great into his church, though that be more difficult than for a camel to go through the eye of a needle. Whilst therefore we remember with gratitude, that he hath showed his word unto us, and favoured us with his statutes and judgments, as he did Jacob of old: whilst we are watchful not to abuse these privileges to our deeper condemnation, and study to show forth his praises in our holy lives: let us also pity, hope, and pray for, those that are not so dealt with and have not known his judgments; for the Lord is able to remove every obstruction to their conversion, that all nations may join in his solemn worship, and praise him as the God of Israel.

'From the heavens and those unutterable heights, where hosts of immortal spirits, admitted to the sight of their King, enjoy unfading pleasures, the song is to begin. And when the strain is thus set by the celestial part of the choir, it is to be taken up and echoed back, by the creatures of this lower world, animate and inanimate, which have all their several parts assigned them, in the great work of glorifying their Creator.' Patrick.) It ought not to pass unnoticed, that this verse is future, "They shall praise, &c.;" and may be considered as a prediction of that time, when "the earth shall be full of the glory of the LORD, as the waters cover the sea."

V. 14. The horn, &c. Or, "He exalteth a Horn for his people:" "He hath raised up for us a Horn of Salvation, in the house of his servant David; as he spake by the mouth of his holy prophets, which have been since the world began." "He hath set over us a powerful prince for the defence and safety of his people; whose fame he hath hereby raised to the highest pitch of honour." (Bp. Patrick.) But David was only a shadow of Him, who is "a Light to lighten the Gentiles, and the Glory of his people Israel."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Every effort of the zealous believer to praise the Lord, causes his boundless excellencies to unveil themselves more fully to his enraptured, admiring, thankful heart: and thus he becomes more and more conscious of his inability to praise his God in a suitable manner. He therefore rejoices to reflect, that there are innumerable hosts of angels before the throne, in the heights of heaven, who are able to praise him in more exalted strains: and though they need no incitement; yet his desire that God should be worthily glorified, will make him ready to call upon them to proceed in their lofty adorations: and he would wish, if it were possible, that the sound of their praises might be heard on earth and echoed back in responsive chorus by all its inhabitants. Indeed all the works of God, above and below, (fallen rational creatures excepted,) without our exhortation, do in their way proclaim the Creator's praise: and it is worthy our notice, that men, who do not praise the Lord and obey his command, are more ungovernable than the monsters of the deep, than the raging sea itself, than the stormy wind, or the devouring flame. But how desirable would it be, if kings of the earth, and all princes, nobles, and rulers, would count it their honour to lead the chorus of praise to the Lord, and use all their authority in promoting his glory! and if all people would unite in this service! How reasonable and becoming would it be, for young men and maidens to employ the fire and vigour of their active spirits, and to seek their pleasure and joy, in doing the will and celebrating the praises of the Lord: and for the aged to show that they are ripening for heaven, by teaching their infant-posterity to lisp thanksgivings unto him! Alas, how little do any of us feel or express of this fervent spirit of adoring love and gratitude! and how few of the human species praise him, in concert with the angels and saints in heaven! But we are taught to pray, "Hallowed be thy name, thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." Nor will our fervent prayers be always unanswered: "for all kings shall yet fall down before God our Saviour, all nations shall do him service." In the mean time, let us show that we are his saints, by praising his name continually. He is not only our Creator, but our Redeemer, who hath made us "a people near unto him," and will exalt us "above all our enemies. His name only is excellent; and his glory is above the earth and heaven:" and in redemption those infinite excellencies and that unspeakable glory are displayed to our view, and form the source of all our hopes and joys. Whilst sinners are invited to draw near unto our reconciled God; his believing people are called to rejoice in him; and the language of joy is praise and thanksgiving. With such a subject and such obligations, what words can be sufficiently expressive, what affections sufficiently ardent! May the Lord pardon and accept our languid

NOTES.

PSALM CXLIX. V. 1. Several conjectures have been formed, concerning the time and occasion of this triumphal song of praise: but it is probable that David composed it not long before his death; and that the Spirit of prophecy led him, (beyond the occasion, whatever that were,) to celebrate by anticipation the future triumphs of the church, over all enemies, at the millennium, and after the general resurrection.

V. 2. Made. Made them his people, as well as created them men. (Notes, c.)

V. 3. Dance. Let them leap for joy, as David did at the removal of the ark to mount Zion.

V. 4. Beautify. The beauties of holiness, and the special honours which God confers on his people, will render them most beautiful and glorious; especially, when compared with their previous low and mean condition, and their deep self-abasement on account of their sins.

V. 5. Beds. They sing aloud, in a state of perfect ease and security, resting from their labours, but not from their Hallelujahs. (Horne.)

V. 6. 'In assured hope of victory, they shall go to 'war with psalms and hymns in their mouths, concerning
'the great acts of the Lord; which they shall courageously
'sing with a loud voice, when they shall fall on their ene'mies, and prefer to the two-edged sword which they carry
'in their hand.' (2 Chr. xx. 21, 22.) (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 7—9. Many of the Lord's servants in ancient times, were commissioned to execute vengeance, according to his word, upon the heathen kings and nobles: and the marginal references will convince the impartial reader, that somewhat of a similar nature will take place, when Antichristian powers are to be destroyed, and more glorious times introduced. And doubtless they, who are expressly appointed "to execute the judgment written," may do it in entire consistency both with meekness and mercy. But the honour intended for all the saints of God, consists in their final

PSALM CL.

Repeated calls to praise God for his glorious excellencies and mighty acts, with triumph over the enemies of their salvation; and in being assessors with Christ in judgment, to concur in the sentence denounced upon wicked men and apostate angels, and perhaps by assisting in its execution.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

New mercies demand continually new songs of praise, to be sung in the congregation of the saints on earth, and in heaven. And the children of Zion have not only to bless the God who made them, but to rejoice in him as having "created them in Christ Jesus unto good works," and formed them saints as well as men: they should therefore express their gratitude in every way of which they are capable:
and not only rejoice in his pardoning mercy, but likewise in his benign and equitable government. If the LORD takes pleasure in his people, surely they should rejoice in him as their Portion and eternal Recompense. When he hath made sinners humbly sensible of their indigence and unworthiness, and rendered them meekly willing to be taught, saved, and ruled by him: he will "beautify them with salvation:"
he will clothe them with the robes of righteousness, adorn them with the graces of his Spirit, renew them to the beauty of holiness, and cause them to bear his image, reflect his glory, and rejoice in his felicity for ever. Let his saints then rejoice in the hope, and in the earnestness, of his glory: let them employ their waking hours upon their beds in songs of praise; yea, let them be joyful upon the bed of death, and sing aloud with the last fragments of their strength, assured that they are going to their eternal rest and glory. Let the high praises of God be in their mouths, whilst they wield the two-edged sword of the word of God together with the shield of faith, in their warfare with the world, the flesh, and the devil. For to whatever work, conflict, or suffering they may be called upon earth, they shall all have the honour of being more than conquerors over every enemy of their souls, through "the blood of the "Lamb, and the word of his testimony." And when their salvation shall be completed, "the judgments written shall be executed on the haughtiest enemies of Christ and

NOTES.

PSALM CL. V. 1. It is most probable that this psalm was composed on purpose to close the book, perhaps by Ezra, when the whole number was collected : as the first psalm formed a most suitable introduction to it. The word translated in his sanctuary, may be rendered for his holiness : and "the firmament of his power," (while the expression leads the thoughts to the visible heavens, and the bright luminaries that adorn it,) was perhaps intended for the invisible heavens, and the glorious displays of the power of God, which excite the admiration and adoration of the blessed inhabitants of those happy regions.

V. 3-5. It would be vain to attempt an explanation of these various kinds of musical instruments, which have long since ceased to exist, or have been exchanged for others : but it is obvious to remark, that God required his ancient people to employ their whole skill, as well as their whole soul, in praising him.

V. 6. Can a more proper conclusion to this book be so much as imagined, than that contained in this striking verse?

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

They who praise the Lord in his sanctuary above, behold displays of his power and glory, of which we can have no conception : but the greatest of all his mighty acts is known in his earthly sanctuary, and forms the foundation of our hope, and the subject of our admiring gratitude.
The glorious holiness, the excellent greatness, and the unfathomable love of our God, are more displayed in man's redemption, than in all his other works. Let us well study this subject as our preparation for the world of glory :
and let us celebrate the praises of our God and Saviour for it, according to our present capacities. And surely those expressions of joy and love, which the enraptured Psalmist, as from the third heavens, hath so earnestly recommended, cannot be unsuitable to the sacred work, if properly used.
Finally, if we begin by separating from the ungodly, and delighting in the sacred word, (Psalm i.) and proceed by lively faith and fervent prayer, to follow after holiness, resist temptation, and maintain communion with God ;
we may hope to close with exulting praise, and to end our lives, ardently exhorting all that have breath to praise the Lord.

THE BOOK OF PROVERBS.

IMMEDIATELY after the prophetic and devotional compositions of David, we enter on the writings of his son Solomon, whose character and actions have already been considered. In the sacred historian's account of Solomon's extraordinary wisdom and knowledge it is said, that "he spake three thousand and five hundred proverbs, and his songs were a thousand and five; and he spake of trees, from the cedar-tree that is in Lebanon, even to the hyssop that springeth out of the wall; he spake also of beasts, and of fowl, and of creeping things, and of fishes" (1 Kings iv. 32, 33.) No more, however, has been preserved of his writings, than the books of Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes, and Canticles, or Solomon's song; (except a few Psalms which seem to have been composed by him :) these alone, it is probable, being calculated for the religious instruction of mankind, and sufficient for the purpose of attractive variety, in a revelation, the whole of which was intended, by the wisdom of God, to be distinguished by comprehensive brevity, and adapted to general usefulness. In respect of the book before us, we may suppose, that the selection contained in it was made in part by Solomon himself, in his old age, from his other works; and the rest by the men of Hezekiah, namely, those Prophets whom that pious Prince consulted; and among these were Hosea and Micah, and especially Isaiah. We may therefore assuredly conclude, that it was conducted under the superintending inspiration of the Holy Spirit. Indeed the express quotations from this book, or most evident references to it, in the New-Testament, constitute the fullest proof that our Lord and his apostles considered it, not merely as the work of a very wise man, but as a part of the oracles of God. For satisfaction on this point, let the reader compare the following passages. (iii. 11, 12. with Heb. xii. 5, 6.—iii. 34 with Jam iv. 6. and 1 Pet. v. 5.—x. 12. with Jam. v. 20.—and 1 Pet. iv. 8.—xxv. 6, 7. with Luke xiv. 9, 10.—xxv. 21, 22. with Rom. xii. 20.—and xxvii. 1. with Jam. iv. 13.) Many more evident references might be shown, but these are sufficient for the purpose.—The original name of this book is Meshalim, which seems to signify authoritative maxims, or maxims of high estimation and authority: and a great part of it is made up of detached aphorisms, containing most important practical instruction.—'The proverbs generally consist of two sentences, joined in a kind of antithesis, the second being sometimes a reduplication, sometimes an explanation, and sometimes an opposition' (or contrast) 'to the sense of the first. This style of composition produces great beauty in many other parts of Scripture, where it is employed for poetical arrangement.'—'The wisdom of all ages, from the highest antiquity, has chosen to compress its lessons into compendious sentences, which were peculiarly adapted to the simplicity of earlier times, which are readily conceived and easily retained; and which circulate in society as useful principles, to be unfolded and applied as occasion may require.'—'Solomon's Proverbs are so justly founded on the principles of human nature, and so adapted to the permanent interests of man, that they agree with the manners of every age, and may be assumed as the rules for the direction of our conduct, in every condition and rank of life.' (Grey.)—'It was usual for wise men of old, when their observation lighted upon any thing that might prove beneficial in common life, to reduce it immediately, and contract it into some short sentence.' 'The great antiquity of this sententious way of speaking is apparent enough from the passage of David's, "As says the proverb of the ancients, wickedness proceedeth from the wicked." (1 Sam. xxiv. 13.)' (Bp. Patrick.)—Indeed such short maxims comprehending much instruction in few words, and carrying their own evidence with them, are well suited to direct the conduct, without over-burdening the memory, or perplexing the mind with abstract reasonings; and there are in all countries old proverbs, or common sayings, which have great authority and influence on the opinions and actions of mankind. Such maxims, however, want their proper basis, namely, the sanction of a divine original; and being generally the mere result of worldly prudence, are too often calculated to impose on the judgment, and mislead those who are directed by them. But the Proverbs of this book are not only far more ancient than any others extant in the world; but they have also received a divine imprimatur, and are infallible rules to direct our conduct in every circumstance of human life: and we shall perceive the meaning and utility of them, in proportion to our experience in true religion, our acquaintance with our own hearts and with human nature, and the extent and accuracy of our observation on the characters and affairs of men.—It has also been made evident by the learned, that several persons among the heathen, who acquired reputation by framing or collecting proverbs, enriched their works from the treasury before us, nay, drew from it their most valuable materials. It would be unreasonable to expect direct prophecies in a composition of this nature: and though we shall not lose sight of Christ, and his truths and precepts; we should by no means endeavour to find out the peculiar doctrines of the Gospel, in every part of the book. These must be learned from those portions of Scripture which treat more expressly on them: and having our hearts enlivened in communion with God, by meditation on those devotional exercises which we have just closed, we may here be instructed how “to walk in wisdom towards them that are without;” to live in this evil world without being entangled or polluted by it; and to pursue our eternal interests, and our present peace and holiness, in connexion with the honour of God, and the benefit of the church and of the world; so that it would be very useful for those, who can command their time, at some stated season every day, to read, and deliberately consider a few of these maxims, with reference to their own conduct in the various affairs in which they are concerned.—The book seems not to have been all written at any one period of Solomon’s life, but from time to time as circumstances occurred. It is however, probable, that the first nine chapters were framed, as an introduction to the whole, towards the close of his days. This is reckoned the first part of the book, or the preface to it. The second part extends from the beginning of the tenth chapter, to the seventeenth verse of the twenty-second; and more strictly speaking contains the Proverbs. In the third part, which reaches to the end of the twenty-fourth chapter, the sacred writer again addresses his son or scholar, as present, with more connected exhortations.—The fourth part consists of proverbs collected by the men of Hezekiah, and reaches to the end of the twenty-ninth chapter. And the last two chapters, which bear the names of Agur and Lemuel, are regarded as the fifth part, and will be considered more properly, in the exposition.—There can be no doubt, but the whole, or the greater part, of the book is a poetical composition: yet, the nature and rules of Hebrew poetry are at present so little understood, that every attempt to alter the original, or to interpret its meaning, by reasons deduced from the metre, must to the serious mind be entirely unsatisfactory.

For they will furnish him with the most excellent notions; and make him capable to understand things of the highest concernment; both as to be just and good in all private transactions; and in public trusts and offices to judge and act according to right and equity. The most unskilful persons may here learn to be circumspect and wary; and they who are childish, to behave with prudence and discretion.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 5. The Septuagint translation of this book is allowed to be very faulty: yet this verse is rendered in it with great energy. 'Which,' (instructions,) 'a wise man hearing will be wiser; and the man of understanding shall possess government;' the talent for governing, or the authority of a governor.

V. 6. Dark sayings. (Note, Ps. lxxviii. 2.) The word signifies riddles, or enigmas, which of old were used, not for amusement, but to impress important instructions the more deeply on the minds of those who studied to unriddle them.

V. 7. (Note, Ps. cxi. 10.) 'There is not such a wise instruction to be found in all their books,' (those of the most admired pagan writers,) 'as the very first of all in Solomon's, "The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom;" without which men are but fools, and, having no regard to their Creator, will despise the wisest instructions.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 8. Perhaps Solomon meant to address himself to his son Rehoboam, exhorting him to regard the instructions and rules, which he had received in his education, as most ornamental to him. It is, however, a general exhortation to young persons to receive the instructions, and submit to the authority, of their parents, as the surest method, in subserviency to the fear of God, of obtaining the esteem and respect of all wise men. The appellation "My son," may also be considered as the language of that authority and affection, which should unite in a public teacher of religion. 'And not only hearken to thy father, when he teaches thee to fear God; but—let thy mother's commands be a law unto thee, especially when she bids thee observe the directions of thy public instructors.—

'The second step to wisdom is, next to God, to bear great reverence to parents, both natural and spiritual; to God's ministers,—to whom if children be not bred to give a great regard, they seldom prove virtuous. It is very observable how much human laws differ from the divine: the former generally only providing that due regard be given by children to their fathers, but taking no notice of mothers. But God in his law takes care to preserve a just reverence both to father and mother equally.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 9. Young persons too generally seek notice and admiration by external decorations, and vain ostentation in divers ways: while they neglect both the fear of God and respectful obedience to their parents and superiors; which are vastly more becoming, and more valuable in the judgment of all wise men.

V. 10—14. This transition seems to imply an instruction to parents, as to the counsels and warnings which they should give their children. Combinations among individuals for carrying on a kind of private war, either within the community or against the adjacent territories, have been common in many ages and countries; and have not exposed men to that stigma which high-way robberies and murders do, in countries governed by a stricter police. The unreasonable and disproportionate reputation, acquired by military valour and conduct, has often caused such exploits to be considered as proofs of a man of spirit, and opportunities of acquiring, or displaying, a capacity for war and victory, as well as of making a fortune: and the blood shed in them to be considered as a thing of course. Just as the murder committed in duels, by men who call pride and revenge the point of honour, is not considered as so atrocious a crime as murder is in other circumstances; nay, sometimes it adds to a man's reputation in defiance indeed of common sense and Scripture. When therefore, a young man, destitute of the fear of God, and weary of subjection to prudent parents, was secretly persuaded to make an inroad on the neighbouring countries, or to lay wait for the companies of travellers or merchants, and, without cause or provocation to shed their blood, and enrich himself with their plunder, he would not in general be very scrupulous, but consider the attempt as a kind of military expedition. This might easily be shown to have been the case, by innumerable extracts from ancient history. And when any one considers with what eagerness men engage in privateering, as soon as they receive permission to plunder the merchants of a neighbouring country with impunity; and how small account they make of the blood shed on either side, in attempting to seize the property of those with whom they have no personal quarrel: he will readily perceive how little most men are governed by principles of equity and humanity; when motives of interest urge them on, and they may gratify their avarice without losing their reputation, or exposing themselves to the lash of the law. For in the court of conscience, of reason, and of Scripture, this common practice is not much more justifiable than that of these ancient associated freebooters: except a man can say, as in the presence of God, 'I do not seek private emolument, but the public good; and to weaken an unjust and unreasonable enemy, that an equitable and durable peace may be re-established.'

V. 17-19. The snare of Satan in exciting men to rapine and bloodshed is as manifest, as the net spread in the sight of the bird, who will in that case fly away. He aims to allure those that are greedy of gain, by the prospect of plunder and impunity, to shed the blood of their unoffending neighbours. And by this bait he intends to take their souls in his net. Such depredators commonly come to an untimely end, either by the sword of justice, or by that of war, or of private revenge; and they are all the while treasuring up wrath against the day of wrath and vengeance. For however human laws are framed and executed, and however they may be eluded or out-braved; yet the vengeance of God pursues every murderer to death and perdition, except deep repentance intervene. They therefore are as foolish, as if they lay in wait for their own lives and souls. The last clause may be rendered, "Which taketh away the lives of those who are under the power of it." Gain, when greedily sought and by unjust means, proves the destruction of those who are thus led captive by the love of it.

V. 20. The word translated wisdom is plural, as well as feminine; and is generally understood to mean the highest and most eminent wisdom, and may either denote the instruction of God's word, personified, as Wisdom speaking to mankind, or Jesus Christ, as the Word and Wisdom of God, and the great Prophet of the church and Light of the world. Whether the sacred writer intended expressly to prophesy of the Messiah; or whether the Israelites would generally consider him as the speaker in these addresses, needs not to be determined. To us, who have the New Testament for our guide, this latter is by far the most simple manner of considering the subject, and it gives the exhortations of wisdom a peculiar majesty and emphasis: nor can any material objection be made to it; unless men would substitute carnal wisdom, in the stead of that wisdom which is from above. And the coincidence of the words of wisdom with the doctrine of Christ, renders it obvious to adopt this mode of exposition. 'He that is the eternal and uncreated Wisdom of the Father, uses all means to draw men unto God: both by his works, and by his word, he inviteth all men to the knowledge and love of the truth.' (Bp. Hall.) 'This wisdom is the eternal Word of God.' (Marg. Ref.) It is remarkable that the original is future, "Wisdom shall cry with-

V. 21-23. Christ, by his own personal ministry, and by that of his apostles and evangelists, and ever since by his faithful and zealous ministers, hath addressed himself to sinners, in the most earnest and public manner, and in every place where they are to be met with: of this he gave the example by preaching in houses and synagogues, the courts of the temple, the streets, fields, mountains, and plains, as occasion required. By "the simple ones, who love simplicity," are meant the ignorant, unwary, and careless, who love to continue thoughtless and dissipated; having no desire to trouble their minds about any thing which interferes with their present pursuits of pleasure or worldly advantage. "The scorers who delight in their scorning," are they who deride and revile the truths and precepts of the Gospel, and glory in their impiety, infidelity, and blasphemy, and in making proselytes to their principles. And "the fools, who hate knowledge," may mean such persons, as have had some acquaintance with religion, and whose consciences have been distressed by it; but determining to gratify their lusts, they hold the truth in unrighteousness, sin in defiance of their convictions, and hate that knowledge which makes them dread the most fatal effects of their daring wickedness: (John iii. 19-21.) Persons, however, of all these characters are here expostulated with upon the madness of continuing longer in wickedness; they are commanded to repent, and turn to Christ, at his reproof; nay, the gift of the Holy Spirit, to be their Teacher and Sanctifier, is promised to such as attend to the gracious proposal. 'I offer unto you, both my word outwardly to your ears, and a plentiful measure of my Spirit inwardly to your hearts, to make that word effectual to you.' (Bp. Hall.)

V. 24-31. The nature and consequences of rejecting the invitations of heavenly wisdom, are here most affecting displayed, and in terms entirely coincident with many passages in the New Testament. (Marg. Ref.) The gracious Saviour invites, exhorts, and warns; but sinners refuse to hearken: he stretches out his hands, to afford them help, or to confer blessings upon them, or as earnestly beseeching them to accept of his salvation; but they pay no regard to him: he gives them the best of counsel, mingled with salutary reproof; but they despise his counsel, and reject his reproof with scorn, preferring the flattering advice of Satan and his instruments; for indeed they "hate knowledge, and will not choose the fear of the LORD." But in the event they will certainly be overtaken with dreadful calamities and terrors desolating them of every hope and comfort; with destruction bearing them away like an impetuous whirlwind, whilst distress and anguish seize upon them. Then indeed, they would fain be rescued from hell by the arm of the despised Saviour, and will hastily call to him to help them: but as they before scorned him and his reproof; so will he then neglect and disdain their cries, terrors, and distress; and thus "they will eat of the fruit of their own ways, and be filled for ever with their own devices." The change of persons, from a direct address to the despisers themselves, to such as are supposed to witness the awful scene, is peculiarly impressive. Let all, who have not been given up to judicial obduracy, hear and take warning: 'Let all notice the equity of this most severe infliction of vengeance on obstinate enemies and despisers.'

V. 32, 33. The sinner's "turning away" from the instructions of Christ, is the immediate cause of his destruction, and a most dreadful species of self murder: while the prosperity, or rather the ease, or carnal security, in which such hardened sinners live, ripens them apace for destruction. ("Ease," that is, the prosperity and 'sensuality in which they delight.') Whereas the holy confidence and hope in God, grounded on his word, of those who hearken to the voice of wisdom, and are preserved from the fear of evil, even in the greatest extremities, is a contrast to that sensual and careless security in prosperous circumstances, which is turned into terror and despair in the season of danger and alarm.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-19.

If God impart wisdom and intrust authority to the same person, a vast advantage is afforded him for the extensive communication of good instructions. But the inspiration of the Holy Spirit gives an authority to the Scriptures, far beyond what they could derive from the honourable descent, the dignity, wealth, wisdom, or renown of those employed in committing them to writing. It is the design of every part of revelation, to "cause us to know wisdom and instruction; to perceive the words of understanding," and to receive lessons of heavenly discretion; that we may pursue the noblest ends by the most effectual means, and may learn to walk with God, and among men, "in justice, judgment, and equity." These divine instructions suffice to render the unlearned and those of slender abilities discerning and sagacious, and able to detect and elude the most crafty designs of wicked men, and of the devil; nay, even to cure the rashness of inexperienced youth, and to render them prudent and discreet. And as Solomon, as He who inspired Solomon, proposed such benefit to us by this book, we should enter upon the reading of it with fervent prayer to the Fountain and Giver of wisdom, to enable us to profit by it. Indeed a teachable disposition, arising from a due valuation of heavenly knowledge, united with a consciousness of our own ignorance and fallibility, form a proper test and standard of our present progress in wisdom. The wise man will always be a learner: he will therefore hear and add to his treasure from every maxim, in proportion as he attains to the true interpretation of it, and discovers the meaning of those words of the wise, that

CHAP. II.

Wisdom promises the blessings of true religion, to those who seek her from God with prayer and diligence, 1—9. And to preserve them from the ruinous ways to the careless, superficial, and conceited, appear dark sayings. All who are taught of God agree, that true knowledge and wisdom are practical; and begin with, and principally consist in, the fear of God, and a due regard to his authority. The most sagacious in worldly things, and the most learned in all human sciences, are miserably infatuated if they despise this wisdom and instruction; and do not make it their grand concern to do the will of God and seek his favour: yet, alas! how is the earth filled, and its eminent places occupied, by such profane and foolish despisers! Whilst young persons are exhorted and “charged to hear the instruction of their fathers, and at “no time to forsake the law of their mothers;” how forcibly are parents called upon to give their children such instructions, to set them such good examples, and so to exercise their authority, as may indeed conduce to their best advantage: and to what a wretched dilemma do many parents reduce their offspring, who must either renounce their instructions and injunctions, or disobey God, and ruin their own souls! In this case indeed the matter is decided; and they must obey God rather than man. But, alas! children are commonly least disposed to be duly observant of wise and pious parents, who would direct them in the way to durable honour and felicity. When youthful inexperience unites with self-sufficiency and impatience of controul, they form a proper prey for the artful and profligate. With flattering caresses, and encomiums, and large promises of pleasure, advantage, and impunity, they entice them to join their cabals and imitate their crimes: and when once they have consented, they are caught in a net whence few ever escape. Would young persons shun temporal or eternal ruin, let them turn a deaf ear to all such syren songs, and refuse to take one step in these destructive paths: for whilst they haste to obtain money to defray the expenses of their licentiousness, “their feet run to evil “and they make haste to shed blood;” thus they are caught in Satan’s net, which is spread before their eyes; they are forming a conspiracy against their own lives; and employing their ingenuity and activity in rendering themselves execrable and miserable, in bringing themselves to an untimely end, and in ripening apace for eternal destruction. So are the ways of all, in every rank of society, who being greedy of gain, seize upon it, by oppressing, or taking away the lives of, their fellow-creatures.

V. 20—23.

example, and in the same fervent and sympathizing tenderness, his ministers should “preach the word, instant “in season, and out of season,” whenever, or wherever they can get men to attend. And surely none should censure their brethren, who cry without in the streets, in the chief places of concourse, and in the opening of the gates, being greatly in earnest to snatch sinners as brands from the burning; when the Wisdom of God hath given them the example. Nay, if the same divine Saviour exhorts, warns, and invites even scorners and fools that hate knowledge, and simple ones who love simplicity; they certainly come the nearest to wisdom, who call upon sinners of every description, to repent, and believe, and be saved. The love and condescension of Christ, and the gracious promises that he mingles with his reproofs, whilst he declares his readiness to pour out his Spirit, and make known his words to those who turn to him, should surely attract the attention of the most careless and ungodly: and it may well be inquired of them, How long they mean to proceed in such a perilous path, when the uncertainty of life, and the tremendous consequences of dying without Christ are considered? But if sinners, bent upon the indulgence of their lusts, now refuse, disregard, despise, revile, and hate the counsels and proposals of the Son of God, they will hereafter curse their own madness and folly. Some few on earth anticipate their own doom, and are left to desperation for a warning to others: and many cry out in terror of conscience for deliverance from torment, without any desire after redemption from iniquity; and therefore they cry in vain; though none can at any period of life heartily pray for the whole salvation of the Gospel, and be rejected. But no words can express the horror, distress, and anguish of the wicked, when standing before the tribunal of their angry Judge: when all their pleas, and extorted cries for mercy, shall be disregarded and despised. “Then will He laugh at their calamity, “and mock when their fear cometh:” turning to others, he will show the reasons of his severity, without vouchsafing them a word or a look: and even the rocks and mountains will refuse to hide them from his wrath. Then will they receive the due reward of their crimes, and especially of their contempt of Christ and his salvation. “Knowing therefore the terror of the Lord, we would “persuade” sinners to repent, and not turn away from the Saviour to their own destruction. And surely we should not fear the cross of his people, nor envy the prosperity of fools which destroys them! But we should hearken diligently and obediently to the Lord Jesus, that we may dwell safely under his protection, and enjoy peace of conscience and confidence in God, and be free from fear of evil, in life, in death, in judgment, and for ever.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1. Wisdom having finally warned the careless and unteachable, who despised her instructions, and denounced their doom, here proceeds to teach and exhort her children, (Matt. xi. 19. Luke vii. 35:) for this seems to be the sacred writer's intention, which he pursues in most parts of these introductory chapters, under the figure of a father instructing his son: though it is the general opinion of commentators, that he had the best interests of his son Rehoboam peculiarly in view, while he was employed on these important subjects.

V. 2. "If thou give thyself to the true knowledge of God without hypocrisy."

V. 3, 4. "If thou expressest such a desire of it, as men do of what they most need, and without which they are in danger to perish: praying those that are able to inform them; and beseeching God likewise, with ardent devotion, that he would bring thee acquainted with it." "If thou dost value this wisdom above the greatest treasures, and show thy esteem of it by studious seeking of it, as covetous men do for money; not giving over thy labour presently, if thou findest not what thou desirest, but inquiring still; and sparing no pains to know what the will of the Lord is." (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 5. "The fear of the Lord," and "the knowledge of God," are concise scriptural terms for the whole of that religion by which sinful men come to God, walk with him, enjoy his favour, and inherit eternal life. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6. "The Lord will give wisdom," (the literal rendering;) that is, to those who thus seek and pray for it: and he will do this, by means of the words which he hath spoken by his holy prophets. The wisdom which he gives by his Spirit in answer to prayer, to those who diligently seek it, accords to the written word, and must be tried by it.

V. 7. He, &c. Some versions render this, "He preserveth the state, &c." Or, "He hideth the salvation of the righteous, &c." "Our life is hid with Christ in God." But the literal meaning seems to be, "He preserveth essential good for the righteous;" all things pertaining to life and godliness; "that which exists independently of this changing world, and shall exist for ever." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9. Some versions include the passage from the beginning of the third verse, in a parenthesis. "If thou apply thine heart to understanding, then shalt thou understand," &c.: the intermediate verses being an explanation of the words "apply thy heart," &c.; and the grounds of the subsequent assurance.

V. 10, 11. The first steps towards heavenly wisdom may be attended with difficulty, and seem unpleasant: but, it is here intimated, that when wisdom hath entered into the heart, it will become pleasant to the soul; and by its pleasantness, as well as its instructions, preserve the possessor from the destructive allurements of sin.—"The word of God shall teach thee, and counsel thee how to govern thyself."

V. 12. (Note, i. 10—14.) One ruinous effect of bad company was shown in the preceding chapter; but another, not less fatal, is pointed out in this: for the company of ungodly and profligate men is the common introduction of young persons into the society of abandoned women.

V. 13, 14. They leave the word of God, which is the only light, to follow their own fancies, which are darkness. Infidelity and impiety prepare the mind for debauchery, and prevent the disturbances of conscience, which would otherwise interrupt the quiet of those who rejoice in doing evil.

V. 16. Strange woman, &c. That is, the harlot or prostitute. These were either heathen women, who subsisted by prostitution in the land of Israel; or such Israelitish women, as were worthy to be treated as strangers, or Gentiles. Some indeed think, that the fascinations of idolatry, or false religion, and of worldly pleasures, are meant in these warnings, as well as the crimes immediately specified: but the literal meaning is of vast importance; and observation on the ways of men will convince a serious inquirer, that the strong expressions used by Solomon, concerning the fatal consequences of these vices, have a peculiar propriety.

V. 17. 'That is, her husband, which is her head and 'guide to govern her; from whom she ought not to depart, 'but remain in his subjection.' "The covenant of her "God," 'is the promise made in marriage.'

V. 11. The dead. The word is the same that is used for the giants who were destroyed by the deluge; and the state of future punishment seems to be intended. 'By 'what name was this place of the damned expressed, be- 'fore the word Gehenna or Gehinnom came to be used? It 'seems to have been called the house of the giants. (xxi. 16.) '—They shall go and keep them company,' (namely, the giants, whose wickedness provoked God to drown the world;)' that is, go to the accursed place and condition 'which they are in.' (Mede.)

V. 19. 'It is rarely seen, that any body, who is drawn 'into her embraces, ever gets out again; she holds them 'so fast by her enchantments, and they are so blinded and 'bewildered by her arts.' (Bp. Patrick.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

They, who earnestly seek heavenly wisdom, will never have cause to complain that they have lost their labour: and the freeness of the gift doth not supersede the necessity of our diligence: (John vi. 27.) God alone bestows this blessing: he hath given his Son to be "made Wisdom unto "us," and in him are laid up all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge for our use. These he communicates through his holy word: and it especially teaches us to fear God and so to know him, as to trust in his mercy, and delight greatly in his commandments. This sound wisdom and substantial good is reserved for the righteous, and for them exclusively, that they may pass safely through this perilous world to heaven: "for the Lord is a Buckler to them that walk up- "rightly." Would we obtain this inestimable treasure, we must receive the word of Christ, and, by daily study and meditation, hide his commandments in our hearts: we must habitually have our ear open to instruction, and our minds applied to understanding. Above all, we must with earnestness "cry after knowledge, and lift up our voice" in prayer for understanding. (Jam. i. 5.) For in no other way can we "understand the fear of the Lord, and find the "knowledge of God." Those persons, therefore, whose religious knowledge has been obtained without this application of mind and fervency of prayer, have an internal demonstration that it is not of the right sort: if it hath cost them only a little of this labour, it must at best be very scanty and superficial: and they who are more eager to grow rich or great; or more intent about their pleasures, or the curiosities of science, than about this divine wisdom; may be sure that as yet they know nothing as they ought to know; nor will they ever, unless they value the prize at another rate, and pursue it in another manner. But they who value wisdom above rubies; and seek for it with that unwearied diligence and perseverance, with which the miner delves in the earth for the silver ore, or the miser scrapes together his heap of money, "shall understand righteousness, "judgment and equity, yea, every good path." (1 Cor. ii. 13—15. Col. i. 9, 10.) For when divine truth thus gains admission into the heart, and the soul is taught to relish and delight in it, discretion shall preserve, and understanding shall keep, men from the dangers to which others are exposed: for it is in this manner that "The Lord keepeth and "guardeth in the paths of judgment, and preserveth the "way of his saints."

V. 10—22.

Besides all the temptations from their own hearts, from the things of the world, and from the stratagems and suggestions of Satan; the numerous bad examples and crafty seducers of both sexes, exceedingly endanger men's souls, especially in the giddy season of youth. But they who ask wisdom from God, and delight in his word, will shun those scenes and companies where these dangers most abound, and will avoid the company of the evil man. For such as "leave the paths of uprightness, to walk in "the ways of darkness: whose delight is in doing evil, and "in the frowardness of the wicked," are very zealous to corrupt the principles and morals of those who are apparently well-disposed; that they may strengthen their party and keep themselves in countenance: nay, being instigated by Satan, and as it were inspired, as his prophets, their mouths utter perverse things: and they are continually disseminating infidelity, impiety, and licentiousness among the rising generations. Thus thousands of simple ones are trained up in the school, are qualified to assume the chair, of the scorner: and the academies for teaching these sciences, are not likely to want experienced and laborious preceptors. Indeed the minds of our youth, before they arrive at manhood, are too generally prepared for scenes of debauchery, in concert with profaneness; and they fall an easy prey to those wicked women, who are too numerous to be thought strangers in our streets. These are perhaps the victims of seduction by more hardened profligates : or a loose education and early habits of sloth and extravagancy lead them into such infamous courses ; or they adulterously have broken the marriage-covenant, solemnly engaged to in the presence of God, and been unfaithful to them who ought to have been the guides of their youth. But, (however themselves initiated in the ways of vice,) they assault the young and inexperienced with their flatteries and insinuating blandishments ; and aid them in getting over the remaining scruples of conscience, and the restraints of fear and shame ; and so qualify them to go forth to seduce the daughters, and debauch the wives, of their friends and neighbours. These are prevailing evils which excite the sorrow of every serious and pious mind ; and must cause the reflecting parent to look upon his children with tears, lest they should be caught in the fatal snare. For, however light the inconsiderate make of these things, it is plain in fact, that “ the house of the harlot inclineth to death, and her paths to the “ dead ;” numbers are thus first led to venture into those violent or fraudulent practices, (in order to gratify the exorbitant demands of an extravagant prostitute, or to support the expenses of their lusts,) which terminate in an ignominious execution, or in banishment from civilized society, to some remote and desolate region, where there are scarcely any to plunder. Thousands prematurely perish by loathsome diseases, perhaps more desolating in these latter ages than the sword of war : others, unreformed, are united with virtuous women, to whom they cause inexpressible misery, and train up children by their example and discourse, to live, like them, the nuisance of society. And the corrupt language of those few of them who live to old age, too plainly shows, that with worn-out bodies they possess hearts as debauched as in the vigour of youth.—The abounding grace of God indeed snatches a very few, as brands out of the burning ; and perhaps sometimes an individual may be otherwise reformed : but these rare exceptions consist very well with its being a general rule, that none, who form connexions and habits of this kind, “ re“ turn again, to take hold of the paths of life.” How carefully then should parents watch over their children, to keep them at a distance from the fatal precipice ! and they should never mention such subjects, as too many do, as the foibles or slips of youth ; but with horror, as the most tremendous of all vicious habits. How carefully should every young man keep at a distance from the entrance upon this perilous way ! shunning such seducers more than a person infected with the plague. How should they store their minds with heavenly wisdom, and learn to relish purer pleasures, and pray to be kept by the grace of God from the dangerous snare, “ that they may walk in the way of good “ men, and keep the paths of the righteous !” For the upright believer shall not only inherit heaven, but have the best portion on earth ; living in the Lord’s land, and enjoying peace and comfort, “ when the wicked shall be cut off “ from the earth, and transgressors rooted out of it.” Finally, let us note, that in general it is expedient for young persons to enter into the married state, before they have contracted bad habits, in order to prevent these fatal consequences : and, having made a prudent and pious choice, to be faithful to the covenant of God, and an affectionate guide of the youth to one who is suited for a helper in the way to heaven. “ For marriage is honourable amongst all men, “ and the bed undefiled : but whoremongers and adulterers, “ God will judge.”

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 2. Temperance, chastity, honesty, and industry, which are inseparable from a life of true piety, do in the ordinary course of things conduce to health, safety, and long life : and this is sufficient to warrant these general maxims of wisdom, without supposing them to be direct promises, which are invariably fulfilled.—Long life is the blessing of God, which he giveth to his, so far forth as it is expedient to them.’

with a man's "leaning to his own understanding." He who "trusts in the LORD with all his heart," is doubtless a true believer; and he expects the blessing from God on his lawful undertakings in the use of allowable means, and these alone: but he who "leans to his own understanding," engages in such pursuits as are agreeable to his own inclinations, and relies on his own capacity, policy, or management for success; and consequently he is under continual temptations to deviate from the path of duty, both as to the end proposed, and the means of accomplishing it. This is therefore the result of pride, unbelief, ungodliness, and a worldly heart; and leads to further transgressions; the other is the way of humility, faith, piety, peace, and safety. This is further recommended by the exhortations to know, and "acknowledge God in all our ways." When a man undertakes nothing without consulting the word of God as to its lawfulness, and seeking his direction in prayer as to its expediency; when he seeks counsel, assistance, and a blessing from God in all his concerns; when he acknowledges his authority and providence, aiming to do his will and glorify his name; when he makes the Lord his Friend and Counsellor in every thing, neglecting no proper means for discovering his will and ensuring his blessing: then he "acknowledges him in all his ways," and may confidently expect "that he will direct his paths." And they who do this constantly, seldom fall into prejudicial mistakes: which almost universally arise from neglect of these rules, from men's fondness for their own schemes, and partiality towards such measures, as seem to promise external advantages or accession to their reputation or enjoyment.

V. 7, 8. 'Never be guilty of such folly, as to conceit thine own wit to be so great, that thou canst manage affairs thereby in thine own way, (neglecting the rules that God hath prescribed thee,) to thy satisfaction:— (Marg. Ref.) but have a religious regard to him, who can either disappoint or prosper thee as he pleases; and avoid most cautiously those practices which he hath forbidden. This is the way to preserve a good habit both of body and soul.' (Bp. Patrick.)

Navel. Some suppose that this clause alludes to a custom of applying medical preparations to the navels of children for the prevention of diseases: and that it was a proverbial expression, denoting health and cheerfulness.

V. 9, 10. Several laws were given concerning the first-fruits of different kinds; most of which were offered at the sanctuary or given to the priests: but some were appointed to be spent in feasting before the Lord, with the Levite, the stranger, the widow, and the fatherless. (Notes, &c. Deut. xii. xxvi.) But the spirit of these laws is here inculcated, by a general exhortation to "Honour the LORD with their substance, &c.;" by employing his bounty in works of piety and charity, as circumstances required; which instead of impoverishing, would secure the blessing of God on their fields and vineyard, and every work of their hands. 'For to the faithful distributor God giveth in greater abundance.'

V. 11, 12. (Notes, Job v. 17. Heb. xii. 5—11.) The apostle expressly quotes this passage, with a special reference to the address, "My son;" and in a manner which decisively proves, that he considered it as the exhortation of our heavenly Father to his afflicted children: Now this method of quoting it, both shows that the apostle considered the book as divinely inspired, and also who it is that speaks in the instructions given by Wisdom to her children. The conclusion, indeed, of the quotation, comes nearer to the Septuagint than to the original; but the former part entirely accords with the passage before us.— 'Suppose it be his pleasure that any affliction should befall thee, my son, let not that dissatisfy thee; nor make thee either doubt of his gracious providence towards thee, or out of impatience take any unlawful course to remove it.' (Bp. Patrick.) The extremes of insensibility and of despondency seem especially intended; and a proper submission and improvement of the paternal discipline are inculcated.

V. 16, 17. 'He that seeketh wisdom, that is, suffereth himself to be governed by the word of God, shall have all prosperity.' (Note 2.) That length of days, which Wisdom holds in her right hand, and offers to her votaries, as her chief good, no doubt includes the gift of God, which is eternal life, through Jesus Christ ; while the riches and honour in her left, comprise all desirable prosperity and comfort in this world. The ways also in which she requires her children to walk, "are pleasantness and peace." — Christ's "yoke is easy and his burden light." "The kingdom of God is in righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost ;" and all the unpleasantness connected with true religion, arises from the opposition of depraved nature and bad habits, with this evil world and Satan, while men are striving to enter her paths ; and the devious steps which even Wisdom's children make, to their grief and wounding.

V. 18. "Tree of life," which bringeth forth such fruit that they that eat thereof have life : and he alludeth to the tree of life in Paradise. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 19, 20. The wisdom which God giveth to his people, is an emanation from his own infinite wisdom, by which he formed the plan of the whole creation, and of its several parts ; and must on that account be unspeakably valuable. The whole, however, may be applied to Jesus Christ, the Wisdom of God, "by whom also he made the worlds." (Note, viii. 22-32.) "Hereby he showeth, that this wisdom, whereof he speaketh, is everlasting, because it was before all creatures, and that all things, even the whole world, were made by it." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 23-25. The composure and serenity arising from faith in the promises and providence of God, and the testimony of a good conscience, are here described as the effects of hearkening to wisdom, in language which agrees with the general scope of the holy Scriptures in this respect. The twenty-fifth verse, like the others, is future ;

and the old translation is more literal. "Thou shalt not fear for any sudden fear ; neither for the destruction of the wicked when it cometh." "When the Lord destroyeth the wicked, he will save his, as he did Lot in Sodom."

V. 26. 'For JEHOVAH shall be present according to thy confidence, &c.'

V. 27, 28. This exhortation exposes the avaricious backwardness of numbers to discharge their debts, taxes, and dues, even when able, and their unwillingness to pay their labourers and servants ; and especially their reluctance to part with their money in acts of piety and charity. When they know not on what pretence to refuse, they procrastinate ; being fondly tenacious of their golden idol ; and hoping that they shall be forgotten, that the design will be dropped, or that somebody else will bear the expense. The Septuagint makes many interpolations in this book, and here adds, 'for thou knowest not what the following day shall bring forth.'

V. 29. Seeing. "And he dwelleth in confidence with thee." "That is, he putteth his trust in thee." The baseness of those who take occasion from the confidence placed in them, to defraud and injure them, is most emphatically exposed.

V. 32. Secret. "That is, his covenant and fatherly affection, which is hid and secret from the world."

V. 34. The apostles, James and Peter, have quoted the Septuagint translation of these words, with no other alteration than that of God for Lord. "God resisteth the proud : but giveth his grace unto the humble." (Marg. Ref.) "If with the scorners, he will scorn ; but on the lowly he will bestow grace."

V. 35. The glory which the wise inherit, is the same that believers inherit according to the New Testament: but everlasting shame and punishment will be the event of the towering and vain expectations with which the ungodly here please to deceive themselves.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

A cordial affection for God's commandments, and a conscientious obedience to them, form the best cure of a treacherous memory in the concerns of religion: and if ten thousand other things were forgotten to make room for the truths of the Scriptures, we should be great gainers. For in the way of believing obedience, health and outward peace may commonly be enjoyed; and, if our days be not long on earth, we shall live for ever in heaven. Whilst we rely on the mercy and truth of our God for salvation, we should sedulously copy them in our own conduct; cultivating a kind and forgiving disposition, and adhering to strict sincerity, veracity, and fidelity, in all our intercourse with mankind; counting these things our ornament, and seeking to have them engraven on the tables of our hearts. Thus we shall have confidence of our acceptance with God, and shall find favour with all good men, and with all others as far as it is conducive to our profit; and shall be evidenced to be men of understanding before God and man. But we can do none of these things, except we "trust in the LORD with 'all our heart:'" we must place our whole dependence on his mercy and grace, his teaching and assistance, his word and providence, for every thing relative to this world and the next. We must not depend on our own sagacity or penetration, our own strength or resolution: we must not idolize our own schemes, or judge of things by the unaided light of our own reason, but according to the word of God; we must submit our understanding to his teaching, and wait in his way for every promised blessing, regardless of intervening difficulties: and whilst we thus acknowledge God in all our ways, he will remove obstructions, prevent mistakes, and direct our paths; but when we prefer our own devices, and grow conceited of our own wisdom; we shall soon be left to prove our own folly. In the fear of the Lord, and in departing from evil, health and prosperity will be real blessings; and if we fail of them, we shall find inward support and consolation. But if the Lord confer on us worldly wealth, we must honour him in the use of it; or it will prove no advantage, but a fatal snare to us; and he cannot be honoured with our substance, be it more or less, if it be extravagantly spent on ourselves in vanity and luxury; or if it be tenaciously hoarded to feed our avarice. Not only justice and temperance must be observed, but piety and charity also: and the more liberally we communicate, in proportion to our ability, the more plentifully we shall reap. For niggardliness is mere narrow policy, like the husbandman being sparing of his seed-corn: but a bountiful and extensive benevolence: a heart as large as the human species, and a hand open to every call of humanity, and every opportunity to promote the cause of godliness, is true wisdom in those who have it in their power.

This by no means tends to poverty, but to bring a blessing on a man's estate; "so shall his barns be filled with plenty, "and his presses shall burst out with new wine." This every one will know, in proportion as he gives credit to the Lord, and puts out his wealth on the security of his promises. But should he see good to visit us with adversity and sickness, let us not forget, that "the exhortation "speaketh unto us as to children:" these also are pledges of his love, and the appointments of his wisdom for our good; "for whom the LORD loveth he chasteneth, even as "a father the son in whom he delighteth." We should therefore neither despise his chastening, by disregarding his hand, or by hardening ourselves in sullen apathy and impenitence, as if we scorned to submit: nor should we yield to impatience and despondency, or be weary of his correction: but we ought to humble ourselves under his hand, confess our sins before him, thank him for his paternal discipline, pray that it may be sanctified to us, and look to him for comfort and deliverance. Thus patience will have its perfect work, and our afflictions will tend to make us "partakers of his holiness."

V. 13—35.

If we at any time or by any labour become acquainted with wisdom, we shall have great cause for gratitude; and may consider ourselves peculiarly happy. For the merchandise of it is far more lucrative to ourselves, and capable of far greater improvement for the good of others, than that which is carried on for the gain of silver and gold: nor are any precious jewels, or conceivable treasures, worthy to be compared unto it; whether the comfort and usefulness of this present time, or the felicity of a future life be considered. For this wisdom is no other than Jesus Christ and his salvation, sought and obtained by faith and prayer; by whose unsearchable riches the believer's debt and ransom are paid, his wants supplied, his soul enriched with knowledge and holiness, and his eternal inheritance purchased: in Christ he hath "wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption." And his left hand, as it were, confers temporal riches and honour, if conducive to our good; for they are absolutely at his disposal. Observing his directions, we walk in the pleasant paths of communion with God, and holy obedience, with a peaceful conscience, a lively hope, and a joy unspeakable and full of glory; and were it not for our unbelief and inattention, we should find all our ways pleasantness and our paths peace: for his are so, but we too often step aside from them, to our own detriment and grief. The Lord Jesus is indeed the Tree of life, of which the believer lays hold and keeps hold by faith and love; for he, by whom the Father made the world, and who by himself purged our sins, can neither want power, nor knowledge, nor love, to guide and support our steps through life, to receive our souls at death, or to raise our bodies from the grave; and his eternal truth is pledged to do all this for his people. Let us then not suffer his words to depart from before our eyes: that so we may keep sound wisdom and discretion; such as will be life to our souls, and our durable honour and ornament. Then we shall walk in his ways safely, and not stumble: we shall be composed in those times of consternation, when sudden fear and destruction overtake the wicked: and when we resign our breath, to be laid in the silent grave, we shall sweetly sleep in Jesus, till the resurrection, when we shall awake to judgment; and shall even then be free from fear; for the Lord through all these scenes “will be our Confidence, and keep our feet from being taken.” In the mean time let us carefully observe his precepts and copy his example: let us do justice, love mercy, beware of covetousness, and be ready for every good work; rendering to all their dues, and giving or lending, as we have opportunity and ability, without grudging, and with alacrity: devising no evil, being harmless and blameless, avoiding needless contention, and bearing every tolerable injury rather than seek even legal redress. Above all, we should be careful not to envy the prosperous oppressors, who grow rich by the sweat, and toil, and blood of men far better than themselves. Far be it from any disciple of Christ to choose any of their ways; for they are an abomination unto the Lord: but his secret consolations remain with the righteous, and his blessing resides in their lowly cottages; whilst his curse rests upon the lordly palaces of the wicked. These truths the covetous and luxurious will condemn, and the infidel will ridicule: but the Lord will scorn such scorers, and everlasting contempt shall be their final promotion: whilst his favour shall be shown, and his grace communicated, to the humble believer, who alone is truly wise, and who shall at length inherit everlasting glory.

‘he knew would be lost without serious consideration of what he had said: and the very first step to wisdom is to have a mind to be wise.’—‘Listen then, all ye that are desirous to learn, to the instructions which out of a paternal affection I bring from God unto you.’ (Bp. Patrick.)—‘He speaks this in the character of a preacher—which is as a father to his people.’ Solomon had one son and two daughters, of whom we read; and perhaps he meant to address himself to them: but the Holy Spirit directed him to such instructions as would be generally useful; and doubtless many thousands have derived more benefit from them than his own son did.

V. 3. Solomon was beloved by the Lord, and appointed to the kingdom; no doubt he was also regarded by his father with peculiar affection, and probably received a more careful education than David's other sons had done, to which the misconduct of Amnon, Absalom, and Adonijah might conduce. Bathsheba had more children by David; but Solomon, being (as Isaac) a child of promise, was peculiarly dear to her likewise. (Note, 1 Chr. iii. 1—9.)

V. 4. ‘To make his exhortations more acceptable, he acquaints the reader with the lessons which his own father and mother were wont to give him; and the great benefit he had received by them.’ This shows, ‘the care that parents ought to take, to instruct their children diligently; and the greater they are (suppose princes) the more accurate their education ought to be, as Solomon's was.’ (Bp. Patrick.) From this verse to the end of the thirteenth, may be considered as David's exhortation to Solomon. (Marg. Ref.)

‘bring him up in the true fear of God: for this was David’s protestation.’ (Notes, iii.)

V. 13. ‘Take such fast hold of it, as never, for want of care and pains, to let it slip out of thy mind: keep it as a most precious treasure, for all thy happiness depends on it.’ (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 14, 15. Solomon, or rather heavenly Wisdom by him, seems here to resume the discourse by most earnestly dissuading from every degree of intimacy with wicked men, and from whatever might prove a temptation to it.

V. 16, 17. ‘To do evil is more natural to the wicked, than to sleep, eat, or drink.’ Having formed their iniquitous plans, they are restless till they have accomplished them: they spend those hours in perpetrating crimes, which others give to repose: and they make their violence and deceit bear the expenses of their voluptuousness.

V. 18, 19. The Septuagint version, of the first of these verses, is very expressive. ‘The ways of the righteous shine like the light: they go on and shine, until the day be perfected.’ The path of the just, or righteous, is that way in which a believer walks, from the time when he begins to seek the Lord to the close of his days. A glimmering of knowledge at first pervades the darkness of his mind, as to spiritual things, and some feeble desires after God and holiness arise in his heart; thus the day dawns: but frequently these feeble beginnings cannot be distinguished from many specious appearances which afterwards vanish: when, however, they arise from divine life communicated to the soul, the glimmering light will increase. Advancing knowledge gradually dispels ignorance and error; peace and comfort are obtained, and established on a firm base; and holy affections and dispositions ripen into fruits and habits. Thus this light shines progressively, not wasting as that of a taper, or declining as that of the setting sun; but increasing as that of the morning, until perfected in the knowledge, holiness, and felicity of heaven. This light comes from Christ at the first, and is augmented, and will be perfected with the knowledge of him: and the way in which he directs the soul, and on which it shines continually, is that of humble faith and obedient love. But the way of the wicked, though they amuse themselves with following many glimmering meteors, is as thick darkness, a compound of ignorance, error, sin, and misery, which continually increases, until at length it terminates in “the blackness of darkness for ever;” into which they stumble unawares, and they know not how.

V. 21. ‘Read them over and over again, and keep them perpetually in mind.’ (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 22. ‘Under health of body all other blessings promised in the law are contained.’

V. 23. As the heart in the body seems the centre and fountain of life, because the blood thence circulates into every part, conveying with it health or disease: so are the affections to a man’s whole conduct. If the heart, in this sense, be purified by faith and grace, and be properly kept, the tenour of the thoughts, words, and actions will be pure, for they flow from it: if it be the residence of pride, impiety, unbelief, avarice, malice, or lust, the whole conduct will be tainted with these vices: if they find admission, or prevail for a season, they will proportionably infect the temper, conduct, and discourse. Therefore this citadel should above all things be garrisoned that it may not be seized, this spring should be watched that it may not be poisoned: for as the heart is, so will the life be; if not openly, yet in the sight of God, before whom thoughts, desires, and dispositions decide a man’s character. ‘For as the heart is either pure or corrupt, so is the whole course of a man’s life.’

V. 24, 25. Next to the heart, the tongue, that unruly member, must be bridled and kept most diligently: and a strong guard must be placed upon the eyes, which are the avenues to the heart: that they may be employed in looking well to the path of duty, and not in gazing at such objects as excite evil desires in thee.

lation of the first clause of this verse; "And make straight " paths to our feet." (Heb. xii. 13.) The marginal reading of the latter clause seems preferable. 'By a proper regard to the path of thy feet, all thy ways shall be ordered aright.'

V. 27. 'Do not suffer thyself to be drawn aside, either ' to superstition on the one hand, or to contempt and neglect of religion on the other: let neither love of friends nor hatred of enemies; neither hope of pleasure nor gain, nor fear of pain and damage; neither prosperous nor cross events, ever move thee to turn into either extreme from ' the rule of virtue.' (Bp. Patrick.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13.

Good instructions, given with paternal authority and affection, have a peculiar claim to the obedient attention of young persons; and will be thus received by every one, who applies his mind to the practical knowledge of divine truth: so that they who refuse such instructions and injunctions will be left without excuse. How aggravated then is the guilt of those who reject the doctrine and forsake the law of the God of heaven, whilst he condescends to speak to them with the tender compassion of a Father! We ought to show our love to our children, by instructing them diligently in true wisdom: and that preference, which is shown to such as are most teachable, is no sinful partiality. A special honour is in Scripture given to the pious education of children, as the means by which the Lord giveth wisdom and grace: and men should requite their parents for this unspeakable obligation, by handing down their instructions, in their name and with respect to their memories, to their children also; for their intention was, that their remote posterity should thus derive the advantage. (Psalms lxxviii. 3—7.) Pious men, in every age of the world, and of every rank in society, agree, that true wisdom consists in obedience, and is inseparably connected with happiness: and the well-beloved Son of the Father says to us, "Let thy heart retain my words, keep my commandments and live:" (Marg. Ref.) He is the Wisdom of God: an interest in his salvation we should get, whatever we go without or lose for his sake; his words we should remember and not decline from them, whatever we forget or omit. This "wisdom is the principal thing," the "pearl of great price," the sinner's "one thing needful:" and if we sell all to purchase it, forsake all to secure it, count all but loss for the excellency of it, and lay down our lives in adhering to it, our gain will be sure and infinite. For whilst we love and honour the Redeemer, he will preserve us from every danger, keep our souls unto eternal life, give us that honour that cometh from God, adorn us with the ornament and beauties of holiness, and deliver to us "a crown of glory that fadeth not away." But how poor, and contemptible, and wretched will they be, who, with all their getting of wealth, of learning, of reputation, of preferment, or dominion, die without getting understanding, "without Christ, without hope, and without God!" Let us then receive the sayings of Him who "hath the words of eternal life;" and we shall daily perceive and experience, that "He hath taught us in the way " of wisdom, and led us in right paths." Thus shall we avoid the intricacies and perplexities in which crafty men are entangled: our path will be plain before us, and we shall proceed with alacrity, confidence, and safety; not straitened in our steps, nor stumbling over the obstructions which are laid in the paths of the heedless and inattentive; and which can only be avoided by "taking fast hold of " instruction," resolved "not to let her go, but to keep " her, as our life."

V. 14—27.

The counsels of heavenly wisdom continually warn us to keep at a distance from the society and the infectious example of wicked men; and to avoid their path, "passing by " it, turning from it, and passing away," being afraid of coming within the reach of their fascinations. There are many in every age who are restless in pursuit of the pleasures and advantages of sin, or in indulging their malice and revenge; who are miserable when they cannot be mischievous to their utmost wish; who riot in excess upon the gains of their fraud, rapine, and oppression, regardless of the groans and tears extorted by their violence, and to support their extravagance and magnificence. This is one way of the wicked, and it is as increasing darkness; and, if persisted in, will speedily and unexpectedly plunge them into final misery and despair. "But the path of the just is as " the shining light, which shineth more and more unto the " perfect day." Their comforts are continually increasing, their characters perfecting, their sorrows expiring: and the hour of death will only occasion a short interruption of their increasing light, which will suddenly break forth in perfect and eternal day. Let us then be observant of our great Teacher, and keep our eye continually upon his directions, and hide them in our inmost souls, "for they are life unto those that find them," and a medicine for all our maladies. But would we make progress in our heavenly path, we must keep our hearts with all diligence, and more sedulously than we do our money, our estates, our habitations, or even our characters; "exercising ourselves to have a conscience void " of offence towards God and man." With all vigilance and earnestness, and with unceasing prayer, we should labour, that no evil desire may prevail or abide in our hearts: avoiding every thing which poisons this fountain, by exciting pride, envy, malice, avarice, or sensual lusts; crushing the first emotions of such evils, as we would the brood of a scorpion; guarding the avenues of our senses, imagination, and memory; storing up pious instructions, and using every means to render our minds a treasure of holy thoughts and affections, and to increase in them hatred of sin, grateful love, reverential fear, and benevolence in all its delightful exercises; that from within these holy streams may issue forth, and fructify our whole conduct and conversation. Above all, we should seek from the Lord Jesus, that living Water, that sanctifying Spirit, which is in the hearts of believers "a well of water springing up into " everlasting life." Thus we shall be enabled to put away from us a froward mouth and perverse lips: our eyes will be turned away from beholding vanity, and fixed upon our path; looking straight before us, that we may see and shun the snares and devious tracks into which others are beguiled: pondering the path of our feet, that we may take no false steps, but that all our ways may be established in consistency and propriety; turning neither to the right hand nor to the left; avoiding all extremes; keeping the middle path; removing our feet from every evil thing; walking by the rule of God's word, and observing the cautions, and treading in the steps, of our Lord and Master. In this view, what a beautiful, excellent, and happy thing is true Christianity! But, alas, how far do we come short in every particular! Lord, forgive the past, and enable us to follow thee more closely for the time to come!

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 3. 'By honey and oil, he meaneth flattering and crafty enticements.'

V. 4-6. 'The beginning of this love is not so sweet, as the conclusion is bitter; after a short pleasure follows long pain, with remorse of conscience and anguish of spirit: for like a sword that cuts on both sides, she wounds both soul and body.' 'She leads those that follow her, to an untimely, shameful, and miserable end; —destruction, not only here but hereafter.' 'She hath more ways than thou canst ever know of, (winding and turning herself into a thousand shapes,) to keep thee from so much as deliberating a return to a virtuous course of life.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 8. 'Shun all familiarity with her; avoid her as thou wouldst the plague.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 9. Cruel. This may refer either to the harlot herself, who would readily concur in the plunder or murder of her paramour; or to some of those wicked men connected with her, who waited the opportunity of robbing or assassinating such as she took in her net: or to a husband, whom jealousy rendered merciless to the man who had thus injured him. 'She will have no pity on thee; as is read of Samson and the prodigal son.'

V. 13. 'I wanted no good instructions of my parents, tutors, friends, and God's ministers; who informed me of the danger, and taught me to escape it: but, alas! I was so sottish as not to obey them; so contumacious that I did not consider what they said unto me.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 14. In the midst, &c. This expression may either mean the assembly of wicked people, where every species of abomination is shamelessly perpetrated; or in the face of mankind in the most open manner; or, as some think, that even in the midst of the congregation assembled for the worship of God, the man's heart and imagination were employed about almost all kinds of wickedness. If men were, as many seem to think, almost exclusively the seducers, it is wonderful that Solomon should speak of women as the chief tempters to these vices, and bestow so much pains to put men upon their guard against their enticements, saying so very little on the counterpart of the subject. And we should remember, that this is not the wisdom of Solomon only, but the wisdom of God also. Doubtless external alterations in society may effect considerable changes; the seduction of females is now often attended with peculiar aggravations; and the abandoned of both sexes are reciprocally the tempters of the more virtuous: yet upon examination it must appear, that bad women multiply the seduction, (if that term may be used,) of heedless youths, far more rapidly than bad men seduce modest women. A few of them comparatively suffice to corrupt whole cities : and it might perhaps be ascertained by facts, that some insinuating prostitutes have initiated more young men into these destructive ways, in the course of a year or two, than the most abandoned rakes have debauched virgins during their whole lives. So that, though these latter should be treated with great severity : yet the grand effort of those in public stations, who would effectually promote reformation, should be directed to the restraining, or at least driving out of sight, those wretched females, who are the pestilence and nuisance of society, and equally the objects of compassion and of abhorrence.

V. 15—19. Some interpret these verses as an exhortation to honest industry, contentment, and liberality : but it seems vastly more natural to suppose the inspired instructor prosecuting his subject, and in this figurative language, recommending marriage to those young pupils, who were tempted to the crimes before mentioned. ‘ He sheweth that God blesseth marriage, and curseth whoredom,’—‘ happy shall those every way be in such a wife, whom I advise thee to take in thy youth.’ (Bp. Patrick.) Instead of drinking, as it were, the muddy and poisonous water from the common sewer ; let every man have a well, or a cistern of his own, filled with pure and wholesome water : considering the offspring of his virtuous union, which he will confidently regard, and without shame acknowledge to be his own, as so many fountains and rivulets, by which other families, so to speak, may be watered and replenished, and his name and posterity honourably perpetuated ; and not like the dubious, spurious, and disgraceful offspring of illicit intercourses. The inspired writer proceeds with his advice, by exhorting a man to rest contented with the wife he hath taken ; to bless God for her, and count himself happy in her, and in an honourable offspring ; and to pray for a blessing upon them ; to be cheerful in the company of his wife, (who is like the loving hind, or the pleasant harmless roe, and does not at all resemble the crafty, rapacious, and licentious harlot ;) cherishing her with endeared and increasing affection, and never giving the least liberty to his passions but in her company. It is observable that Solomon, though he had had so many wives, gives no intimation of polygamy, or encouragement to it : whence we may infer, that he wrote these cautions after he was made sensible of his own madness and folly. And knew that violating the original law of

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

If we bow our obedient ear to wisdom, we shall both regard discretion in our own conduct, and our lips will keep knowledge for the use of others : and we always need, but especially in youth, her salutary cautions ; for innumerable snares and temptations beset our path. But there is no one which hath proved fatal to greater numbers, than the blandishments of strange women. Nay, this hath generally been Satan’s method of drawing men off from the worship of God, into idolatry, or diverse forms of false religion, which are spiritual whoredom and adultery. The soothing language of these fascinating tempters, blended with flatteries, professions of love, and artful persuasions, are as pleasing to the carnal heart, as honey from the comb to the palate ; and are smooth and insinuating as oil. But the consequences of yielding to their enticements prove bitter as wormwood, poisonous as hemlock, and sharp as a two-edged sword : nay, the harlot’s “ feet “ go down to death, her steps take hold on hell.” And should a man, who hath got entangled in this snare, seem disposed to consider his ways, to return to virtue, or to inquire after the path of life ; his artful deceiver can employ a thousand wiles to withdraw him from his purpose. She can change her looks, her language, or demeanor, at pleasure, and into innumerable forms of falsehood : she can affect grief, despair, affection, resentment, jealousy, contempt, aversion, as may best suit the present purpose ; and by reproaches, caresses, complaints, menaces, tears, and expostulations, she can wind herself into every form, discover every avenue to the heart, work upon every weakness and passion, and avail herself of every unguarded moment, to resume her influence and rivet her chains : so that there is no knowing all her moveable ways, and scarcely any escaping from the fatal snare. Safety can therefore only be found by keeping at a distance, removing our path far from her, and not coming nigh the door of her house : even shunning the streets and passages where such tempters wait for their prey. This must be decidedly the conduct of every one, who would not risk every thing dear and valuable : and they who palliate such intercourse as a small matter, are as little versant in the private history of mankind, as in the words of divine wisdom. Multitudes in this way continually lose their reputation, sink into contempt, and are left to the necessity of subsisting by the most destructive pursuits: thousands have fallen victims to the jealousy, revenge, or rapacity of a base prostitute or her associates: and what can men expect from trusting themselves with women, of whom they scarcely know any thing, but that they are destitute of conscience and of shame? But should this peril be escaped, no better can be expected, but that by the expenses of such pursuits, a man's substance should be wasted among the basest strangers, and himself, with his family and friends, left to beggary and misery. At the same time the constitution is generally ruined beyond recovery; and those diseases are contracted, which consume the body in the most loathsome manner, and bring thousands to the grave, and which form a constant testimony of God's abhorrence of this iniquity. In this wretched situation many a miserable sufferer too late regrets his folly, and "mourns at the last, when the flesh and body are consuming, and says, 'How have I hated instruction, and my heart despised reproof! and have not obeyed the voice of my teachers, nor inclined mine ear to them that instructed me! I was almost in all evil,' in the midst of every congregation of evil-doers. Should such reflections be admitted in this life, and the evil of such a course of iniquity be duly perceived by a miracle of mercy, true repentance may at last prevent the most tremendous consequences, and the destruction of the flesh may prove the salvation of the soul. But they, who have most opportunity of witnessing such scenes, have but seldom the satisfaction of seeing good evidence of this true though late repentance: alas! far more die as insensible and profane as they have lived. And what language of man can express the case of the self-ruined sinner, in the eternal world, enduring the reproaches and keen remorse of his own conscience, "his worm, that never dieth!" whilst he recollects despised warnings and expostulations, and good instructions of parents, teachers, and ministers, all treated with hatred and disdain; yea, the convictions of his own conscience, and the strivings of the Holy Spirit, all stifled and extinguished, by rushing into every kind of evil, with a headlong disregard of consequences; till sudden destruction come upon him, without the possibility of escape.

V. 15—23.

But let us avert our eyes from the doleful scene before contemplated. Every man should study to keep himself, if possible, from the inclination to such destructive vices, which diffuse sin and misery more rapidly than any other: and the encouragement of lawful marriage is one means, which God hath appointed for these purposes. This was good for man in his state of innocency; and it is become much more needful, since the fall has given his passions such an accession of force, and his enfeebled powers have lost their authority over them. Every restraint upon marriage, or dissuasive from it, may operate as a temptation to vicious habits and connexions: and that which might have prevented, seldom avails to cure these evils. But this preservative used in the fear of God, and in dependence on him, will not prove ineffectual: and the comforts of the married state, when prudently and piously entered into, and when the duties of it are faithfully and affectionately performed, are so superior to all the base pleasures of illicit connexions, and produce such contrary effects to individuals and to society in every respect, that if men will not renounce their reason, they must prefer these running waters from their own fountain, to the pestiferous exhalations of a stagnating putrid pond. Indeed, they who have once tasted the endearments of domestic life, with the rational conversation of a virtuous and affectionate companion; together with the satisfaction of seeing a family of hopeful children, growing up to be useful members of society, commonly lose all inclination for scenes of licentiousness, except where previous bad habits have debauched the mind: and multitudes, who seem not influenced by higher principles, live in this way respectable members of society. But there are so many dangers and hinderances, as to this desirable settlement in life, from the present state of human nature; that we can have no assurance of being properly yoked, except as we acknowledge God in respect of it: attending to the rules of his word, preferring prudence and piety, to wealth, wit, or beauty; and seeking his direction and blessing. When a man has entered into the married state, he should consider that he is bound to treat his wife with tenderness and affection, though she be not without faults and imperfections; not only because she is his own choice, but because she is the woman that the Lord hath allotted him. He should therefore continually seek the blessing of God on their union and family, by fervent prayer; and study to be cheerful and happy in her company; and not allow a thought or desire to wander after any other person. For why should a man desire forbidden fruit, when he may have all that is needful and good for him, honourably, with allowance and a blessing? Let us ever remember, that though secret deviations from our duty may escape the eye of our fellow-creatures; yet "a man's ways are before the eyes of the LORD, and he pondereth all his goings." If no other apprehend the adulterer or fornicator, to put him to shame, or testify against him, his own iniquities will entangle him as in a net, and his sins will bind him, as with cords, for the vengeance of his offended God: and they who despise these maxims of heavenly wisdom, shall die without instruction; and their doom shall prove the greatness of their folly, in going astray from God's commandments.

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1—5. A partial regard to insinuating companions, or near relations, whose circumstances, prudence, or honesty are not fully ascertained, induces incautious persons, especially the young and unsuspecting, to be bound with them for sums of money above what they can afford to lose: and often to enable a man, who is discontented in his station and in haste to be rich, to prosecute some favourite scheme; or to extricate himself from difficulties into which his rashness or extravagance have plunged him; or to support a delusive show of affluence and treacherous credit. Thus men risk the ruin of their own circumstances, the forfeiture of reputation and liberty, the injuring of their families, or even the defrauding of their creditors: when perhaps their consent was obtained at some convivial meeting, or when heated with liquor! Such contracts seem in Solomon's days to have been finished by verbal promises, and striking of hands before witnesses. If then any one had been drawn into such a snare, and was taken with the words of his mouth: ('for a man's own lips are a strong snare to him.' Sept.) it was his duty and interest, to extricate himself, if possible, by the most humiliating concessions and equitable proposals, that he might either induce the creditor to discharge the security, or his friend to pay the money: and this without the least delay; as the deer would escape from the hunter, or the bird from the fatal snare of the fowler.—It cannot be supposed that surety-ship in every case is unlawful, or even inconsistent with prudence. Such engagements may, nay must, frequently be entered into by many persons; and it would often be inconsistent with friendship, benevolence, and even justice, to refuse them. But the dangerous extremes to which this matter is carried, the fatal effects of men rashly engaging for large sums, and the cruel advantage frequently taken of their indiscretion, render it a general truth, that "He who hateth surety-ship is sure;" and some exceptions may well agree with a good general rule. Nor can it consist with honesty, in any ordinary case, for a man to be bound for more money than he is able to pay, along with his own debts, and a fair prospect of maintaining his family.

V. 6—11. Diligence is every man's wisdom and duty; that he may not be a burden to society, that he may be out of the way of various temptations, and have it in his power to relieve the distressed. The sluggard is therefore sent to school to the insignificant but provident ant; who, destitute of reason and without any instructor or ruler, takes more proper care for the future, than the slothful do with all their advantages. Habits of indolence grow upon people: they cannot resolve to leave their beds, and go to work, to encounter difficulties, or bear hardships; they make abundance of excuses, and if none prove satisfactory, they only desire a short respite, a little, and a little more, indulgence in sloth.—Thus the day is spent in sleep or inactivity; life runs to waste: and poverty, seen at a distance but not regarded, draws near with sure and gradual progress, like a traveller; and when he arrives, he proves an armed man; all resistance is in vain, and pinching want becomes the inevitable consequence. This slothfulness is frequently the effect of being brought up with the expectations of a large fortune, and then coming untutored into possession of it; while habits of industry are generally contracted by young men who have not such expectations: and thus some grow rich and others poor, in unremitted succession, one generation after another; which shows, that even in respect of this world, the anxiety of men to heap up wealth for their children is vanity and folly. The Septuagint exhorts the sluggard to consider the bee likewise. 'Or, go to the bee, and learn how skilfully she labours, and how completely she finishes her work. 'Whose labours kings and private persons carry away for their health: for she is desirable and honourable among all; because being weak as to strength, she hath added wisdom to acquire reputation.'

V. 12—15. Solomon here contrasts the sloth of those, who might be profitably employed, with the unwearied application and wily sagacity of the sons of Belial, the determined and desperately wicked: or, he shows how indolence and extravagance make way for a man being gradually led on in sin, through urgent temptations; till he becomes the most abandoned and mischievous of the human species. They who have totally cast off the fear of God, with all regard to justice and honour, form schemes of iniquity, and pursue their object without intermission, by lies, flatteries, slanders, or perjuries. Thus they “walk with a froward mouth.” They form themselves into cabals, and have their secret signs understood by each other. “So that they wink with their eyes, and speak with their feet, and teach with their fingers.”—The artifices of gamblers and covetous usurers, to draw in young spendthrifts, may be intended. Or the conduct of hypocrites, who with the language, the attitudes, the affected demure looks, and every action of extraordinary piety, carry on their trade of devouring widows’ houses. Their mouths, and hands, and eyes, and feet, are all employed: and even in their closet, at the church, and at the Lord’s table, they are pursuing their one object, with lifted eyes, and bended knees, and hands spread forth.—Or in general, it may mean, that all the powers, faculties, senses, and members of wicked men, are instruments of unrighteousness; and according to their different propensities they pursue their object uniformly: for frowardness is in their heart, and they are continually devising mischief, and sowing discord, in neighbourhoods and nations, that they may fish in troubled waters; or because, as the children of the devil, they love mischief for mischief’s sake: but by all this they only ensure their own destruction.

V. 16—19. These seven abominations seem to have been mentioned by Solomon, as found in the practice of the children of Belial whom he had been describing: they were sure therefore to destroy such as persisted in them, because peculiarly hateful to God the Judge of all.

V. 20, 21. These commandments as given by parents are supposed to coincide with the precepts of God: and this tacitly instructed parents what injunctions to lay upon their children, and how to exercise their authority.

V. 22. (Note, Deut. vi. 7—9.) ‘When thou walkest lead her forth, that she may be with thee; thus when thou sleepest let her keep thee, that when thou awakest she may talk with thee.’ (Sept.)

V. 23. ‘Every particular command of God is like a candle; and the whole law is like the light of the sun; to show thee thy way and exhilarate thy spirits: nay, the severest reproofs which correct thy errors, and reduce thee to obedience, are the way to the greatest happiness.’ (Bp. Patrick.) The words law and commandment are in such passages put for revelation in general; and not for any one part of it as distinguished from others.

V. 25. Eye-lids. Either the decorations of painting and attire, or the wanton glances of a licentious woman; which wound and kill, in a far different sense than deluded lovers suppose when they use such expressions.

V. 26. A piece, &c. That is, a fragment or crust of bread, the meanest morsel by which life can be supported. This expression describes that extreme poverty, to which fornication often reduces those who have before lived in affluence; as the latter clause of the verse does the fatal effects of adultery.

V. 27—35. Solomon had before intimated, that some of these strange women had “forsaken the guides of their youth, and forgotten the covenant of their God:” but he here particularly considers the consequences of adultery with a woman that yet lived with her husband. It would be as vain to commit this crime in expectation of escaping detection and punishment, as to take fire into the bosom, and not burn so much as the raiment; or to walk on burning coals and the feet not be burnt. (Notes, &c. Num. v. 11—31.) And indeed no man could be at all familiar with a married woman, without guilt and a powerful temptation to more atrocious criminality. A thief who stole from mere hunger, might escape contempt, through compassion for his distress: yet he that was caught stealing, was condemned to restore seven-fold, or abundantly, though it might reduce him to poverty or even slavery. But adultery, being a far more intolerable injury, was by the judicial law of God punishable with the death of both parties: it was a proof of a more desperate state of the heart, and could admit of no plea; and it was a more egregious folly, as if a man should at once wilfully murder both his body and soul. In the judgment of all wise and pious men, the adulterer would contract an indelible disgrace: and would involve himself in quarrels that might terminate in bloodshed. For jealousy, when a man knew or suspected himself supplanted in the affections of his wife, and dishonoured by her unfaithfulness to his bed, commonly excited the most implacable rage and resentment. In prosecuting the criminal, the injured husband would demand the rigorous execution of the law, and not regard any ransom, presents, or submissions: and if he failed of obtaining redress from the magistrates, he would be ready to execute vengeance with his own hand upon the injurer. So that he that committed adultery, did it as one about to destroy his own soul.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15.

The Scriptures instruct us in discretion, even as to our temporal concerns, for the peace of our own minds, the comfort of domestic life, the welfare of society, and the honour of the Gospel: and a life regulated according to the oracles of God exceedingly conduces to our true interest, even in this present world. We are stewards of our worldly substance, and ought not to dispose of any part of it, but by the allowance of our Lord: we hold it in trust, for our families, for the poor, and for the church; with a license to take a portion for our own use, according to our station: but to waste his goods extravagantly, or in rash schemes and speculations, is a very criminal breach of trust. Justice, piety, and charity, unitedly call on us to be upon our guard against such engagements, as may entangle us

VOL. II.—No. 16.

in difficulties and temptations, be injurious to others, or deprive us of the means of being useful. And if any have been thus drawn in, it behooves them to lose no time, spare no pains, and shrink from no difficulties, by which the ruinous effects may be prevented, or mitigated, if possible. But such obligations are sooner entered into than got rid of: and a promise, a letter of credit, or a bond hastily given, may so involve a man, that he can by no means avoid bankruptcy. Hence we learn how much easier it is to ruin than to save ourselves; that our heedless conduct may be long after remembered against us; and that every rash and wicked, yea, every idle, word must be accounted for at the day of judgment. But how base are they who take advantage of a man's indiscreet partiality to draw him in to his ruin! or, who will not submit to every hardship, to extricate the man whom they have thus involved! In these matters our supposed friends often prove strangers to us, and show that we were strangers to them; and by acting with the cruelty of enemies, painfully teach us to place no confidence in man. If, however, we ought in prudence to stoop, strive, and employ every means, to escape from impending temporal calamities: how should we be in earnest and make all haste to flee from the wrath to come, and to “recover ourselves from the snare of the devil, who hath taken us captive at his will!” Nor should we forget Him, who willingly became our Surety, when we were strangers and enemies, though he well knew how dear it would cost him to pay our debt, and ransom our souls, and how ungrateful we should often prove.—It may abate our wonder that sinners should be so negligent in seeking an interest in his great salvation; when we observe how improvident numbers are about the present world. Though we are formed wiser than the animal tribes, yet multitudes voluntarily become more foolish than they, and might learn wisdom from the most despicable of them, if they were not utterly unteachable. Whilst many incessantly weary themselves to gratify an insatiable avarice, numbers can by no means be induced to a proper degree of attention and diligence; though they see abject poverty marching to meet them as an armed man! We may expostulate with such sluggards, and demand of them, How long they mean to waste their hours in sleep, and their days in inactivity? But they will still crave respite, and require “a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep:” and few are recovered from these habits, who have once contracted them. How carefully then should we guard against beginnings, and learn to redeem precious time; to rise early when health permits; and to inure ourselves to diligence and hardiness, in our respective callings! And how carefully should parents and teachers watch over young persons, and prevent their becoming habitually slothful and self-indulgent! But, it is still more important, that men should avoid indolence in the concerns of their immortal souls; and that, in the present transient and precarious summer of life and health, they should prepare for the approaching winter of sickness, death, judgment, and eternity. To numbers it may well be said, "Go to the ant, thou slug-gard, consider her ways, and be wise." "How long wilt thou sleep, O sluggard? When wilt thou arise out of thy sleep?" "Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light." But, alas! they love their sleep of sin, and their soothing dreams of worldly felicity; and crave a little sleep, and to be excused, as yet, from repentance, prayer, self-denial, and diligence: they mean to set about this irksome work some time, but not now: and so they compose themselves again; yet not without imbibing a deep resentment against those officious intruders who attempted to awake them. But their destruction slumbereth not; it approaches every moment, and will ere long come on them with irresistible violence; and when they "lift up their eyes in hell," they will have full leisure to rue bitterly their folly. Lord, awaken them to see their danger, whilst yet there is a way of escape! and awake all of us, (for we are yet half asleep, and ready again to close our eyes,) that we may give diligence to ensure our own salvation, and to seize every opportunity of glorifying God, and of doing good to the church, and to the world! For the children of the wicked one are vigilant, diligent, sagacious, and persevering in their schemes of mischief: their heart continually deviseth, their lips utter, and their fingers work, wickedness: their eyes look abroad for their prey, or wink whilst they seize upon it; and they are wholly intent upon their pernicious projects: yet by all this they only serve the cause of Satan, and ensure their own destruction. And shall Christians, who have such prospects, obligations, motives, and examples, be inactive, inconstant, and lukewarm? Shall we neglect those things which the Lord loveth, by which he is honoured, and which he will graciously reward? God forbid! No, let us be "steadfast, unmoveable, always abounding in his work, knowing that our labour is not in vain in the Lord."

V. 16—35.

We ought to judge of every thing by the rule of the sacred word, and not according to man's judgment. The pride of heart, which appears in a haughty and self-important countenance, may be termed dignity or a noble spirit; but God abhors it, and will resist it, and abase it into the dust. A lying tongue, whether employed in slander, flattery, or polite simulation or dissimulation, is an abomination to him. He hateth "hands, that shed innocent blood," though it be done honourably, or in ambitious wars, or in order to conduct a lucrative commerce. Whatever decorum appear in the life, the Lord "hateth fact related, to illustrate the artful way by which they draw in the unwary to their destruction, 6—23. Another warning against all approaches to this vice, from its fatal effects on many eminent persons, 24—27.

"the heart that deviseth wicked imaginations," as well as "the feet that be swift in running to mischief." Not only the false witness who speaketh lies in a court of justice, but the tale-bearer, "that soweth discord amongst brethren," is an abomination unto him. Let us then shun these things, and watch and pray against every propensity to them: and let us avoid with marked disapprobation all who are guilty of them, whatever may be their rank in society. The word of God will likewise instruct young persons to honour and obey their parents, in all things lawful and proper; which will greatly conduce to their honour and comfort; indeed it will guide us all in the path of peace; inspire us with confidence in God by day and by night, in life and in death; be our counsellor and companion, with whom we may pleasantly and usefully commune at all times; and the more we allow heavenly wisdom to speak to us, and the more we relish her discourse, the clearer light will shine upon our path, through this dark and uncomfortable world. Nay, the severest reproofs of instruction tend to keep us in the way of life: especially in warning men from the company of bad women, and guarding against their inveigling flattery. Whilst with apparent rigour, the Lord declares, that "He who looketh upon a woman to lust after her, hath committed adultery with her already in his heart;" he mercifully deters all that regard his word, from the allurements of her beauty, or of the magnetic attraction of her wanton glances; and so keeps them from the paths which lead to disgrace and poverty, as well as to everlasting misery. But there is a malignity in adultery, and danger from it, distinct from other species of this vice: and the adulteress especially is Satan's agent, to hunt precious souls into his net. Indeed we in this land have no penal statutes, by which adulterers are punishable with death, or waters of jealousy to detect the secret offender: so that men may think of escaping detection or punishment. Nay, the frequency of the crime, and the numbers involved in the guilt of it, have almost obliterated its infamy; and a pecuniary mulct is now commonly considered as a compensation for the crime; not out of Christian forgiveness and gentleness, but from a base and mean spirit, a want of abhorrence of vice, and a proper sense of the inestimable value of female chastity and conjugal fidelity. And so the matter is sometimes compromised, with almost as much disgrace to the injured, as to the injurer: whilst the poor thief, who steals perhaps for want, is imprisoned, condemned, and executed, with contempt and ignominy, and almost without pity; nay, perhaps is found guilty, by a jury, some of whom are living in this more atrocious crime, (even if the judge himself be blameless,) and injuring individuals and families in such a manner that all the wealth of the Indies could not countervail the damage! We cannot but observe, that this by no means accords with the scriptural view of these interesting subjects.

We should, however, considering the state of this evil world, be thankful for the benefits, which we enjoy under civil government and our present rulers; though we consider many things far removed from perfection. Yet let no adulterer expect impunity: sooner shall fire cease to burn, than God's displeasure shall cease to wax hot against such workers of iniquity. An hour will soon arrive, when the transgressor's wound, (if not previously healed by the good Physician,) will be incurable. Whether the jealousy of an enraged husband can be bribed, or not; an angry God will "not spare him in the day of his vengeance: he will "not regard any ransom, neither will he rest content with "any gifts." But Christians should avoid all approach to, or appearance of, this horrid crime: he that "toucheth "his neighbour's wife shall not be innocent;" every suspicious familiarity will prove a wound and a reproach to a man's character, which will not easily be wiped away: and he that ventures within the influence of temptation, in so perilous a case, as much lacketh understanding, as if he took fire into his bosom, expecting that it would not burn him. May we then not only pray, not "to be led "into temptation," but keep at the greatest distance from it: and may we close our eyes and ears, and every sense and avenue, by which such insinuating poison can enter into our imaginations or affections!

CHAP. VII. V. 2. Apple. The same word is afterwards rendered black (9). 'From the black pupil of the eye, light, or the capacity of seeing, is thought to be produced, by the great goodness and admirable wisdom of the Creator.'

V. 3. 'Do not merely read what I write, but be so well acquainted with them, as to have them, (as we speak) at thy fingers' ends.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 4. 'Cultivate her most intimate acquaintance, as that of the nearest and most beloved relation.'

V. 6-23. This seems to have been an incident which Solomon had witnessed, and investigated, and which he recorded as an illustration of his former observations, (Note, v. 14.) From his window he noticed a raw youth, whose appearance and behaviour showed him to be void of understanding. As he sauntered through the street, perhaps in quest of adventure or amusement, in the dusk of evening, before it was quite dark, he came near the house of a bad woman. It is not said that he intended to visit her, or even that he knew she lived there: but he was loitering about, in a place where he had no business, and at an unseasonable hour. Accordingly a woman came forth to meet him, who was married, and consequently the more criminal and dangerous: for her attire was that of a harlot, and her artfulness was equal to her profligacy. Indeed her whole character was of the same stamp; loquacious and vociferous, stubborn and untractable, she hated confinement and employment, and was perpetually gadding abroad in every place, where she had no business except to work iniquity. Observing, it seems, the youth to be bashful, she threw aside all regard to decency, and behaved and conversed with him in the most shameless manner. To represent her prosperity, and the plentiful entertainment she could give him, she stated that she had been offering a peace-offering in the performance of a vow, and was about to feast upon the sacrifice. Nor will it appear wonderful, that these sacred ordinances should give occasion to carnal feasts, attended with every vice; when we reflect how all kinds of sensuality is indulged in, under pretence of commemorating the nativity of Christ, who was “manifested to destroy the works of the Devil!” This wicked woman pretended, that she came forth on purpose to meet the youth from a peculiar affection: and that her husband, whom she seems to speak of with contempt, was gone a long journey with a bag of money, perhaps intimating that he neglected her, and went abroad to indulge himself; so that there was no danger of interruption or detection. By such enticements she overcame his reluctance and timidity, and compelled him with her flattering words to accompany her. Thus he was suddenly induced to commit a crime, punishable with death by the magistrate, and exposing him to the wrath of God: and if he escaped death at that time, it would serve as an introduction to further crimes, and would probably end in his ruin. So that, (however light licentious poets, actors, and artists, and those who delight in their works and exhibitions, may make of such incidents,) the Wisdom of God declares, that the youth went “as an ox to the slaughter, or as a fool,” (or drunkard who knows not what is going forward,) to be set in the stocks and scourged. Nor would he be aware of his danger, “till a dart should strike through his liver:” and he was as a bird that “hasteth to a snare,” for the sake of the bait, “and knoweth not that it is for his life.”

V. 26. Wounded. Samson, David, and even Solomon himself, were grievously wounded, and numbers of eminent men have been totally ruined, through such tempters. This seems to intimate that these chapters were written towards the close of Solomon's life. His own example, in taking so many wives, probably, had a bad effect on his people; and their abundant prosperity would tend to inflame the disease. His repeated and pathetic admonitions on this subject must have been very painful to him; and they form no inconsiderable proof of his deep humiliation for his own transgressions.

oracles of God, equally demand our attention with that sacred source from whence they are derived. We should, according to the plainest dictates of common sense, be more careful to keep the law of God in our memory, affections, and conduct; than to preserve our limbs, our senses, or even our lives: and if the Lord guard his people as the pupil of the eye, surely we should pay a similar regard to his precepts; “binding them upon our fingers,” ready for use, “and writing them upon the table of our hearts.” We are indeed most graciously invited to seek the benefits and honour of relationship unto Christ, by an obedient attention to his word: and thus we may indeed “say to wisdom, Thou art my sister, and call understanding our kinswoman.” In this way we shall be preserved from the fatal effects of our own passions, and the snares of Satan and his emissaries. And when we can with pleasure employ our leisure hours in searching the Scriptures, in meditation, pious conversation, and devotion; our time will not hang heavy on our hands, and we shall have no occasion to go in quest of amusement and dissipation, to get rid of it. Wise observers of mankind have always noted, that ignorance and inexperience, joined with indolence, and a fondness for roving about and wasting time in vain company, and keeping unseasonable hours, have been inlets to every kind of vice; and they, who thus run themselves into the way of temptation, seldom keep their resolutions of resisting it. For Satan always hath his factors at work; and they who go upon his ground, or near it, will be sure to meet with them. When women forget the origin and use of raiment, and are fond of decking themselves out in a light manner, to attract the notice and excite the passions of beholders; they are far from being innocent, and they give encouragement to licentious men to accost them with sanguine expectations of success. Indeed a mere speculator would not think it possible, that any virtuous woman would choose to copy fashions, or to be seen in attire, resembling those of a harlot! This unaccountable indecorum, joined with a gadding and dissipated mind, a dislike to domestic employments, and a forward, loquacious, noisy, untractable disposition, commonly lead to further enormities: and if a man be so unhappy, as to be yoked to a female of this description, he must expect trials and sorrow. Such wives often make home uncomfortable to their husbands, and drive them to seek satisfaction elsewhere: and then take that opportunity of more deeply injuring them; using every artifice to inveigle others, and to escape detection. In this view, we should recollect that “a prudent wife is from the Lord:” from him that blessing should be sought, and when granted it demands peculiar gratitude. If once female modesty is surmounted, women commonly become more shamelessly impudent than men; in order to inflame the passions, and overcome the scruples, of those whom they address. And when religious ordinances have been perverted from their sacred use; they are often made a cloak of, or occasion for, the most enormous crimes:

CHAP. VIII.

Wisdom calls to the sons of men to hear her invaluable instructions, 1—11. She recommends herself as the giver of numberless blessings, 12—21. She declares her eternity; and that she was present at the creation, as the foundation of Jehovah's counsels and the object of his delight, and as rejoicing in the sons of men, 22—31. She renews her exhortations to hear her words, as the only way to obtain life and the favour of the Lord, and to avoid the wiful ruin of men's own souls, 32—36.

place under the Gospel. Men of the highest and of the lowest ranks are also included.—Nothing short of the most public and clear instructions, in the great truths and maxims of revealed religion, can answer the language here employed: and to explain it as the voice of reason and conscience, or as the moral instructions of men unacquainted with the Scriptures, is, in fact, to make heavenly Wisdom declare, that revelation is not absolutely necessary to teach men the way of life and salvation.

V. 6—8. None, but the Truth himself, and those inspired men by whom he spake, ever could unreservedly adopt these words without high presumption: especially they cannot suit those philosophers, who indeed taught some useful lessons, but mixed up so much error with them, that the apostle says concerning them, “professing themselves wise, they became fools.”

V. 9. (Marg. Ref.) ‘The word of God is easy to all that have a desire unto it, and are not blinded by the god of this world.’

V. 11. (Notes, iii. 16—18.)

V. 12. ‘What is comparable to a prudent mind, which is not crafty to deceive, but so cautious as not to be deceived?’ (Bp. Patrick.)—‘Except a man have wisdom, which is the true knowledge of God, he can neither be a prudent nor a good counsellor.’—It is most obvious to interpret the rest of this chapter, as the words of the Messiah, speaking in the name of Wisdom. Thus most of the ancient fathers explained it: and though their too curious speculations led them into some difficulties, which have induced others to adopt another mode of inter-say, men attend on them, as it were, so purchase licence to commit sin with impunity. He who will stay to hear the flatteries, and to admit the caresses, of an artful woman, will scarcely ever be able to resist her allurements, for victory over this temptation can in general by no means be obtained but by flight. (Notes, Gen. xxxix.) And a man may in an unguarded hour be suddenly persuaded, and as it were forced, by fair speeches, to commit those crimes, that will cover his character with infamy, load his conscience with guilt, fill his heart with horror, plunge him into inextricable difficulties, and do immense mischief; even if they do not terminate in his final and eternal ruin. A consciousness of our own weakness, and an habitual recollection of the consequences of such sins, form our best security against them; in subserviency to watchfulness, prayer, and dependence upon the Lord. Let us then hear the salutary words of Wisdom, and keep our hearts diligently, that they do not decline to the ways or wander in the paths of these seducing destroyers: “whose house is in the way to hell, going down to the chambers of death.” And, as many strong, and, in other respects, wise, men have been wounded and slain in this conflict: we must indeed be void of understanding, if we will rashly venture upon it.

pretation, yet I can see no well-grounded objection to a sober and cautious explanation of it, on this supposition, nor can any other give full satisfaction: for the things spoken are exclusively applicable to Christ, and must be in great measure explained away, before they can suit any other view of the subject. Indeed as he communicates divine truth by the sacred Scriptures, many things must accord either with the Speaker or the word spoken: but some parts of this chapter cannot be explained, with propriety, of the sacred oracles. The ingenuity and sagacity, for instance, by which men find out curious and useful inventions, are the gift of God, but not by means of the holy Scriptures: (Marg. Ref.) And if wisdom, as a divine attribute, be intended, why should the personal Wisdom and Word of God be lost sight of in the exposition, when by him all wisdom is communicated to the sons of men?

V. 13. (Note, Job xxviii. 28.) Though natural knowledge and wisdom be from the same source with divine truth, yet their value is comparatively small, and men often take occasion from them to indulge that pride, arrogance, and perverseness, which God abhors. But “the fear of the LORD” is the principal part, and the sum total, as it were, of true wisdom; and it teaches men to hate all those things which he hateth. (Heb. i. 8, 9.) “So he that hateth not evil doth not fear God.”

V. 15, 16. Christ is called “The Word of God,” and is just after said to have “on his vesture a name written, “King of kings, and Lord of lords:” (Rev. xix. 13. 16.) Accordingly he here reveals himself, as the source of power and authority, as well as of counsel and wisdom. All kings and judges are his deputies, dependent on him and accountable to him. Magistracy is his appointment, and the benefits of it to fallen man are fruits of his mediation. As far as kings and rulers govern in wisdom and equity, they have their qualifications from him, and do his commandment: when they abuse their authority, they undesignedly scourge the inhabitants of the world for their sins; but will at length be punished themselves by the Supreme Judge. These verses in the original, are future, and seem to agree with the predictions, in other parts of Scripture, that in the times of the Messiah the world should be blessed with many eminent, pious, and righteous kings and rulers. These predictions, however, have not yet received their grand accomplishment.

V. 18. “They that love me are beloved of me; and as they will not fail to seek what they love; so they will certainly find what they studiously seek.” (Bp. Patrick.) The word rendered early, means the dawn of the day: but doubtless it also refers to the early part of life.

V. 13. Durable, not uncertain riches; “signifying that he chiefly meaneth the spiritual treasures and heavenly ‘riches.’ Some interpret the passage of wealth obtained by prudent and equitable means, which spends better, and lasts longer than ungodly gain. Yet even these are uncertain riches; and not comparable to “the unsearchable ‘riches of Christ.’”

V. 20. Midst. At a distance from the extremes, into which the different schemes of false religion, and their vehement zealots, urge their deluded followers.

V. 22. “In the beginning of his way, before his works of old,” must mean “the eternal counsels and purposes of God.” “He declareth hereby the divinity and eternity of this Wisdom, which he magnifieth and praiseth through this book; meaning thereby the eternal Son of God, Jesus Christ our Saviour, whom St. John calleth “the Word that was in the beginning.” The whole plan of creation and providence was evidently formed, in relation to him, through whom all the perfections of the God-head were to be displayed and glorified for ever.

V. 23. The word rendered set up, is by some translated anointed, and by others obtained the dominion. It is used in the second psalm concerning the Messiah, “Yet have I set my King upon my holy hill of Zion;” and in the margin is rendered anointed. In the purpose and counsel of God, the divine Redeemer was from everlasting appointed to the mediatorial throne.

V. 24, 25. The word repeatedly rendered brought forth, is translated in the old version begotten, (which in this agrees with the Septuagint, and the language accords to several expressions in the New Testament. (Marg. Ref.)

But whatever term is employed, it must always be remembered, that no human language can convey to us adequate ideas of the incomprehensible mysteries of God. Such a declaration as these verses contain, cannot be made concerning the written word of God; and it is not capable of a very easy and natural application to wisdom as a divine attribute: but it has a peculiar energy and propriety, when applied to the person and work of Christ, as the grand Centre or Scope of all the works of God.

V. 26. 'Before he had put it into this form of lofty mountains and spacious plains: no, there was not the first atom of this globe on which you tread.' (Bp. Patrick.) By the highest or chief part we may understand the formation of man. He was, as to his body, only dust, though the chief and noblest of the dust of the world.

V. 30. 'Then was I present by him, as one that was co-eternal with him; and we did mutually and infinitely solace each other, from everlasting.' (Bp. Hall.) The word, rendered brought up with him, is by some translated, cherished as in his bosom. 'Wisdom had said that she was begotten; now she adds, that she was in the bosom of the Father.' Thus the apostle, (John, i. 18.) "The only begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father;" who never was separated from the Father, always saw the Father; who "seeth what the father doeth, that he may do the like," (with the same will and power;) in whom the Father places his pleasure and delight; willing that by the Son we should approach to him, in the Son we should honour and adore him, and honour the Son as himself.' Some, however, render the word actively a nourisher, or a chief worker; signifying that this wisdom even Jesus Christ, was equal with God the Father; and createth, preserveth, and still worketh with him.' (Notes, John v. 17—30. Marg. Ref.) It is observable, that some of those learned men, who seem inclined to exclude this interpretation, pass over these remarkable expressions without much notice; and indeed deal in general language, to which the reader finds it difficult to annex any precise meaning; except that he will perceive that the divine attribute of wisdom is supposed to be the speaker; but it is not determined in what way her instructions are communicated.

V. 31. 'For man's sake the divine Wisdom took man's nature, and dwelt among us, and filled us with unspeakable treasures; and this is that solace, (or delight,) which is here spoken of.' Wisdom not only rejoiced in the creation of the world, and man formed in the image of God; but "in the habitable parts of the earth," and "in the sons of Adam:" but the earth was not inhabited, nor had Adam any sons, till after the fall; and it is with respect to redemption, that the wisdom of God, in any sense of the term, can be said to take "its delights" among the fallen race of Adam. The Redeemer, therefore, here evidently speaks of "the joy set before him," in the glorious event of his sufferings, to the honour of God, and the salvation of the souls of men; and on that account he immediately uses it, as an argument why they should attend to him.

'With joy I saw the mansion where

'The sons of men should dwell.

V. 34. Daily. The word of God, and the places where the gospel is faithfully preached, without doubt, are "the gates" "and the posts of the doors" of wisdom, at which Christ would have his disciples to wait daily. Many in this lukewarm age, question the propriety of hearing sermons on a week day, and not only absent themselves, but censure those who attend. A few questions may be proposed on this subject. Do such persons generally employ their time better? If other duties demand their attention they certainly do. But may not Christians, consistently with other duties, redeem time for waiting at Wisdom's gate, as well as the children of this world find time for their vain amusements and feastings, who yet do not neglect their one thing needful? Is not the time, spared from attending on a sermon on a week-day, often spent in unprofitable visits or vain discourse? nay, does it not frequently hang heavy on men's hands, and prove a temptation to various scenes of dissipation? And is this more for the honour of God, the good of men's own souls, or the edification of their brethren? Did Christ ever find fault with his hearers for attending him too closely? Were Christians less judicious or more zealous, after the day of Pentecost, than at present? (Acts ii. 42, 46, 47.) Doth it not show a degree of contempt of Wisdom's instructions, and form a

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-21.

When we observe how readily men listen to the seductions of vice, and run in the ways of folly and misery; we are apt to suppose, that the instructions of wisdom are withheld from them, and that they would act otherwise if not left to unavoidable ignorance. Indeed the supporters of superstition and error have devised many ways to keep men in the dark, or to furnish them with excuses for impenitency and unbelief; and many have pretended that there is vast uncertainty respecting the knowledge of the truth and will of God, or difficulty in acquiring it. But the chief difficulty, and indeed almost the only one, is to induce men to attend on instruction. "For doth not wisdom cry? and "understanding put forth her voice?" It was the manner of Christ and his apostles, and it is that of all his faithful ministers, according to their measure of ability, to publish his truths in the most earnest and open manner; to spread divine instructions, by every means and in every place where they can; and to warn, exhort, and call upon men to hearken to them. For without restriction Wisdom calls upon all the sons of Adam, who come within the reach of her voice. She commands "the simple to understand "wisdom, and the fools to be of an understanding heart:" and an obedient attention to the words of Christ will guide the most ignorant into the saving knowledge of the truth. But, alas! men are far more desirous of diversion than of instruction: and places, where folly keeps her school, and demands a high price for admission, are thronged; whilst the Gospel of Christ freely but faithfully preached, without the trappings of human oratory, will comparatively be thinly attended. Yet the condescension of the holy Saviour, in addressing his words, not to angels, but to the fallen sons of men, and to the vilest and meanest of them, demands our strictest regard: and the excellent things that he speaks are worthy to be received by all rational creatures; but especially by sinners, to whom he points out the only way of life and salvation. Every word he utters is right; His lips abominate all guile and wickedness; there is nothing forward or perverse in his instructions; they give no needless pain, impose no useless restraints, demand no unreasonable services, and engage us in no abstruse speculations. There is no insincerity in his invitations, or unfaithfulness in his promises, or unkindness in his precepts. And if his words be unintelligible to any, it is, because they do not fear the Lord; (Ps. xxv. 14;) they are not willing to be the disciples of Christ, or to do the will of God; (Matt. xiii. 11. John vii. 17. 2 Cor. iv. 3, 4;) or they do not put a proper value on the knowledge of the truth, and bestow due pains to acquire it. For when there is an understanding heart and a disposition to receive the truth in love, it is all plain and obvious, and every preceding lesson prepares the mind for those which are to follow. Such persons value wisdom above silver and gold: they count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ: for him they forsake the world, and renounce the most lucrative employments at his command: for they deem "wisdom "better than rubies, and all things that may be desired, as "not to be compared to it." Indeed they know that all prudence and ingenuity are from their Lord; and that, if he saw it good for them, he could discover to them such curious inventions, as would render them eminent among men: but they most admire that wisdom by which he hath made way for the salvation of sinners, consistently with the honour of the divine law and justice. For through the redemption of his precious blood "the riches of his grace "have abounded in all wisdom and prudence." (Eph. i. 8.) Counsel and sound wisdom are with and from him; but the pride and arrogancy, the evil ways and the froward conversation, which he hates, render men unwilling to be his pupils, and close their minds against his humbling, awakening, and holy instructions. He has strength also, as well as understanding; and being the fountain of authority, he can advance his friends, and crush his foes at pleasure: and as by him kings reign, it behooves them not only to decree justice, and to exercise their authority according to his precepts, but to come and trust in him for the salvation of their souls, (Notes, Ps. ii.) Our love to Christ, as expressed by obedience to his commandments and delight in his instructions, is the sure evidence of his love of us: and all, that seek him without delay, shall find him as their Teacher and Saviour. They are peculiarly happy who begin early in life to seek him: for true riches and honours are with him, yea, durable riches and righteousness: whereas the vanishing possessions of this world are often acquired by injustice, and prove dangerous temptations. The fruit of this Tree of life is far better than gold; and even the present comforts of his people surpass all that wealth can purchase. He leads those whom he loves in the paths of righteousness, at a distance from perilous extremes, even in the midst of the paths of judgment; that he may cause them to inherit, not vain shadows, but substantial good, sufficient to satisfy all the capacities and desires of their souls.

V. 22-36.

The consideration of the essential and eternal dignity of the condescending Saviour should greatly endear his instructions to us. From eternity being one with the Father, the Creator and Lord of all; by whom and for whom all things were made and disposed of, with a view to the glory of God in the work of man's redemption: having displayed his wisdom, power, and goodness, in the formation of the heavens and the earth, and all things therein; he was yet willing to stoop and to assume the form of a servant for us men and for our salvation. In the prospect of man's lost estate, he was set up from everlasting in the divine counsels, to be our Deliverer and King: and though well aware of the vast expense of this gracious work, he rejoiced in anticipating the glory that should follow his agonies, and in the delight he should for ever take in his redeemed people, the trophies of his victories, and the monuments of his love. Did he then, and doth he still delight in the thoughts of thus saving us wretched sinners? Did the Father, on this account especially, delight in his beloved Son? And shall not we delight in him and his salvation? Surely with the docility of children we should hearken to his voice: yea, the youngest, that can read, hear, and understand, should receive his counsels, with thankful, joyful, and obedient hearts. Let us all then hear instruction, and be wise, and not refuse such surprising mercy. For blessed are they who hear the Saviour's voice; patiently watching and waiting at his gates: and by daily reading, meditation, and prayer, by constantly attending on his ordinances and observing his directions, seek increasing acquaintance with him and experience of his grace. The more diligent we are, the happier we shall be: for "Whoso findeth him" "findeth life, and shall obtain favour of the Lord." Let us then not be wearied or discouraged in watching at his gates: let us be careful that we be not allured away by worldly pleasures, frightened away by the reproach or terror of the wicked, or tempted to think that we shall wait in vain; for this no upright soul shall do: but they that neglect such great salvation, and hate the instructions of Christ, are murderers of their own souls, and act as if they were in love with death and damnation.

and his Gospel. He, the true Wisdom, hath prepared his church and ordinances, as a commodious and stately palace, for the entertainment of believing sinners. The sacrifice of his death, which was prefigured by the oblations of bulls and goats, supplies the provisions of a rich and plentiful feast for them. The wine also is mingled, to render it more exquisite; and the table is furnished at a vast expense to him, though none to them: The ministers of the Gospel, (called the handmaids of Wisdom, to preserve the propriety of the parable,) are sent forth into all the places of public resort to invite the guests: and the simple, those who want understanding (or a heart, as the words literally signify) are particularly invited to enter in and partake of the feast. But they must be exhorted and commanded to forsake their foolish comrades and sinful pursuits, that they may live and be happy, by going in the way of understanding. The coincidence of this interpretation with two of our Lord's parables, sufficiently warrants it: (Notes, Matt. xxii. 2—14. Luke xiv. 16—24;) and indeed the exposition given of the preceding chapters. — "The Son of God, who is the eternal Wisdom of the Father, hath built his house, the church of God; he hath laid sure foundations of it, and hath hewn out all the pillars thereof. He hath instituted all his holy ordinances, whereby he may feed up the souls of men to everlasting life. He hath sent forth his holy and zealous messengers to invite men to these sacred mysteries." (Bp. Hall.)

V. 7—9. These verses seem to imply directions to the ministers of Christ, whilst they invite sinners in general how to conduct themselves towards men according to the way in which they treat their warnings and invitations. They must be contented with declaring the truth before them, as they have opportunity, and with general warnings and exhortations; but must not persist in personal rebukes of those who show profane contempt, or are notorious for their wickedness; as that will only render them more outrageous and scurrilous, perhaps excite them to circulate slanders out of revenge; and induce such alterations, as may even exasperate the reprove to say or do things that will give them a handle against him: so that nothing can be generally expected from reproving a scorner, but reproach, contempt, and hatred. Whereas there is the greatest encouragement to reprove a wise man when he acts improperly; for he will love the friendly reprove, and grow wiser by every instruction. And as teachableness, and a conscientious regard to the authority of God, are proofs of wisdom; so the attention of instructors should be peculiarly directed to those who seem disposed to profit by particular addresses. But where obstinacy and contempt of the truth are manifest, Christ says to us, "Let them alone;" "you can do them no good at present, but will get harm by them." "If a man cannot endure to be told of his faults, it is a shrewd sign he is in the way to be undone; and hath not so much as approached the gates of Wisdom." (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 10. Holy. Or, Holies, Holy things, or holy persons, or perhaps of the Holy God, and of his truth and will. (Is. vi. 3.)

V. 13—18. The foolish woman seems here to be an emblem, either of sensual pleasures, and the cares, interests, and pursuits of the world; or, of those idolatrous and erroneous religions, which, making large allowances to men's depraved inclinations, allure them from "the truth as it is in Jesus." In this foolish woman clamorousness and ignorance unite with high pretensions and noisy declamations and boastings that mean nothing. She is represented as continually seated in the high places of the city, to draw aside those who were before going on their way: as the harlot entices men who were following their business without previous bad intentions. Some think that she represents the conscientious scruples of those whom she addresses, as simplicity and want of understanding, in the manner that the bashful virtuous youth is often made the fool in a comedy: or it is shown, that she singles out and prevails against such as are destitute of wisdom and grace, alluring them into the ways of sin, with an enchanting delineation of the pleasure to be found in prohibited indulgences; as if the forbidden fruit were to be desired above any in the garden of God. Thus men are drawn from Christ, and are not aware that it is to their destruction; not knowing, that all who hearken to the seductions of vice or error are dead in sins, and that the guests are rushing into the depths of hell. (Note, ii. 18.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

As the divine majesty of Christ, and the excellency of his instructions, demand our obedient attention: so the provisions of his grace to supply our perishing wants should endear his invitations. The new covenant which he hath mediated, the spiritual house he hath builded, the atoning sacrifice he hath offered, the inexhaustible treasures reposed in him; the righteousness, grace, peace, and consolations, which he bestows; the eternal inheritance that he hath prepared; and the meetness for it which his grace effects, are freely proposed to sinners, and conferred on every believer. Whatever carnal men imagine, Christ hath provided a feast for his people; nothing is wanting but a willing mind and a spiritual relish, in order to partake of it: and the invitations given by his faithful ministers to the simple and sinful, imply a direction to them to call on the Lord for these preparatory blessings. Would we partake of Wisdom's feast, we must renounce the society and the foolish pleasures of the ungodly; or we never can enjoy the pleasures of a holy life, or go in the way of understanding: and it is vain for us to continue an acquaintance with wicked men, in order to do them good; as we are far more likely to be corrupted by them; and our best service to them, is to protest against their evil courses by separating from their company. This is in general the only rebuke that it is advisable to give to infidels, scorners, and hardened profligates. It is indeed grievous for a minister by silence and distance to testify against those who despise his message: but seldom any thing, save contempt and reviling, and increased enmity, is got by neglecting this counsel of wisdom: whereas the same labour and freedom taken with those who are wise enough to value instructions, would procure love, and do important good. For none are so wise or righteous, as not in many things to need instruction, and even reproof; and the wiser men are, the better will they take, and the more will they profit by them, if properly given, and by those whose place it is to "reprove and rebuke with all authority." (Ps. cxli. 5.) We are repeatedly reminded that the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom; we should therefore discover, as well as we can, where this fear is planted in men's hearts; that we may lead them forward in the knowledge of God, and into an acquaintance with the holy Jesus; in which all true wisdom and understanding consist, and by which all the blessings of time and eternity are communicated. who hear the Gospel, should consider, that life and death are set before them, and that they are most deeply interested in the choice. If they are wise to choose the one thing needful, ministers and Christian friends, yea, angels, will rejoice, and God himself will rejoice over them to do them good; and their wisdom will prove their own eternal advantage: but if men persist in their scorning, they may grieve the hearts of their ministers and friends; yet they alone must bear the consequence in everlasting contempt and misery. We ought then most earnestly to seek and pray for true wisdom: for Satan hath emissaries of various kinds to withdraw our souls from Christ, with great swelling words of vanity, the result of presumption and ignorance; (2 Pet. ii. 10—22. Jude 13.) Not only do worldly lusts and abandoned seducers, prove fatal rivals to Christ for the souls of men: but false teachers, with damnable doctrines, which flatter the pride and give liberty to the lusts of men, compass the destruction of multitudes. These especially draw off such as have received serious impressions, and are disposed to do many things, and to attend on the word of God; but are not experimentally acquainted with the truth, in the love and power of it: such unstable souls are soon seduced into superstition, enthusiasm, or antinomian licentiousness, or any other plausible corruption of Christianity, according to the fashion of the age: they are persuaded by fair words, that so much diligence and self-denial are unnecessary, and that they may obtain heaven on easier terms: they are allured with the hopes of gratifying their darling passion with impunity; and their natural propensity to covet forbidden objects is readily wrought upon. Thus they are prejudiced against the humbling truths and holy precepts of God's word: and are drawn aside into the ways of error: "not knowing that the dead are there, and that her guests are in the depths of hell;" for "the last state of such men is worse than the first."—"From all the deceits of the world, the flesh, and the devil; from all false doctrine and hardness of heart; and from all contempt of thy word and commandment, good Lord, deliver us." Amen.

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1. Here the Proverbs, properly so called, begin; which are short maxims of wisdom relating to our conduct in life, in subserviency to our own best interests, to the benefit of mankind, and above all to the glory of God.—The comfort of parents greatly depends on the conduct of their children, and this suggests to both parents and children powerful motives for attending to their several duties. The heaviness of the mother may be mentioned, because mothers have previously had a more abundant share of pain and sorrow about their children: and it is therefore the more cruel in them, when grown up, to occasion further distress by their subsequent misconduct, to such kind friends, whom they ought by all means to requite; and to whom they should aim in every thing to be a comfort.

V. 2, 3. Great riches, gotten by fraud or oppression, or spent in wickedness, do no real good to the possessor: for the Lord will soon tear them from him, or him from them; and he will cast them away as worthless and contemptible, as utterly insufficient to ransom the life or soul. Yet such riches are the most valued substance of ungodly men! But on the other hand, righteousness, (the nature of which must be learned from other parts of Scripture,) secures a man from the sting and fatal effects of death: and though the righteous should be poor in this world, the Lord, who provides for his soul, will not famish him as to his temporal life. These verses may be connected with the preceding verse: 'Let the Father's care in educating his children—be equal to the joy he will have in their well-doing: and let the mother beware that her indulgence does not spoil them: for she will have the greatest share of the heaviness which their untowardness will give.—' This is more necessary than the care of heaping up riches for them; which many times tempt men to fraud and oppression, &c.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 4. The words rendered "with a slack hand," may signify the hand of deceit—without diligence, honesty can scarcely be expected. 'Next unto virtue, let children be trained up to industry—for both poverty and fraud are commonly the effect of sloth.' (Bp. Patrick.)—The Septuagint here adds, 'A well educated son shall be a wise man, and shall use the foolish man as a servant.'

V. 5. Activity and sobriety in youth will enable a man to requite his parents, and render him a credit and comfort to them: as well as establish his credit for prudence. But the sluggard will be a scandal and grief to those by whom he hath been educated.

V. 6. Violence. The consciousness or detection of their violent dealing, in oppressing the poor, will stop the mouths of the wicked ; and render them like men whose faces are covered when led to execution. 'When their wickedness shall be discovered, they shall be dumb, and not know what to say.'—The clause, however, may be rendered, "The mouth of the wicked covereth violence." They use a variety of pleas, and employ all their eloquence to conceal, or excuse and justify, their cruelty and oppressions. For example, who can help thinking of the ingenious, but interested, advocates for the cruel and oppressive slave-trade?

V. 7. The memory of righteous and merciful men shall be celebrated with just commendations, after their deaths ; however clouded by envy and calumny at present : but all the endeavours of the wicked and their panegyrists to establish their characters, shall not preserve their memory from merited infamy.

V. 8. True wisdom disposes men to regard and obey the commandments of God, and those of their superiors, in all things lawful : but that knowledge which merely serves to furnish men with topics of disputation and loquacity, and their various methods of abusing the gift of speech, will rebound to their own disgrace and misery. 'The foolish in talk shall be beaten.'

V. 9. (Notes, Ps. cxxv. 5.) The upright believer goes strait forward in the plain path of sincerity, honesty, and piety ; thus he is both safe and free from perplexing fears, as there is no secret ill design or practice which dreads detection : but the dissembler, after all his shuffling and subtlety, will certainly be exposed, either here or hereafter ; and he lives in continual apprehensions of being put to shame.

V. 10. (Notes, vi. 12—19.) 'The dissembling person causeth much sorrow at last, both to himself and those that have been deceived by him : but a prating fool that utters all his heart, procures stripes to himself, without further danger to others.' (Bp. Hall.)

V. 11. The good treasure of a righteous man's heart continually furnishes wise, pious, and edifying observations. So that they, who converse with him, may draw from him instructions for the prudent conduct of life, as occasion requires. But the mouth of the wicked is employed in disguising or palliating his violent dealings ; (Note 6.)

V. 12. Where hatred reigns, every trifle excites contentions : the least slip is resented and aggravated ; the best meant words or actions are misrepresented or misunderstood, and nothing is passed over. But where love prevails, mistakes and offences will be either overlooked, or speedily forgiven : so that, notwithstanding the imperfections of those who live together, they bear with, and make the best of each other, and peace and harmony are preserved. The evident meaning of this latter clause should be kept in mind, by all who would interpret the apostle's quotation of it. The Septuagint, not having clearly expressed the genuine meaning of the passage, St. Peter does not quote from it ; but he gives us the plain meaning of the original ; and St. James, in an evident reference to the passage, uses almost the same words. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 13. The translation of this verse in the Septuagint is remarkable. 'He, who bringeth forth wisdom from his lips, smites the foolish man with a rod.' Obstinate sinners should be treated with severity : for such discipline is most calculated to do them good ; and indeed they are wilfully preparing misery for themselves in this world and in the next. 'He that would be wise must seek the acquaintance of some intelligent person ; but he that is void of consideration will never learn, unless perhaps by some great affliction.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 14. Wise men are always learning : they value useful knowledge as misers do gold, and are continually studying to increase their treasures ; which they carefully preserve, till opportunities are afforded of communicating them for the instruction of others. But fools soon speak out all they think, and spend their scanty stock, without regarding consequences ; by which they do immense mischief, and ruin themselves. The word rendered destruction, properly means consternation, or anguish of mind.

V. 15. Riches indeed often preserve men from many hardships and injuries ; and poverty exposes men to much oppression and injustice. But the rich confide far too much in this security, which cannot ward off pain, death, or damnation : and the poor are too much cast down by their difficulties, which cannot prevent their comfort in the favour of God, or the salvation of their souls. (xviii. 11.) The same word is used as in the foregoing verse ; and the clause may be rendered, "The consternation of the poor is their poverty ;" they are often more afraid of it, than of sin.

V. 16. The labour of the righteous, being a part of their duty, not only supplies their present wants, but tends to their salvation. While the most valuable inheritances, the extraordinary successes, and very unexpected accession of wealth and preferment, with which a wicked man is favoured, serve only to inflame his passions, and supply him with materials of sinful indulgence; and thus eventually they add to his guilt and condemnation. The verse may be rendered: "That which a righteous man obtaineth by his labour, is unto life: but the income," (or revenue,) "of the wicked unto sin."

V. 17. Erreth. The traveller, who has missed his way, and is too proud to hearken to directions, is likely to wander still further from his road: and the sinner, who distains to be reprov'd, will scarcely be convinced of his mistake, till he opens his eyes in the pit of destruction. Some understand the clause actively, 'He that leaveth off to give reproofs encourages men in their errors,' (or causeth them to err.) (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 18. The man who flatters those whom he hates, and covers malicious devices with professions of friendship; and then propagates slanders to the ruin of their reputation, is evidently destitute both of wisdom and grace.

V. 19. 'Much speaking is rarely innocent: therefore he that is sparing of his words, and considers well both when, and where, and what he speaks, is a truly prudent person.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 20, 21. Yet the gift of speech is too valuable a talent to be buried: like the precious metals it should not be squandered; but on proper occasions it should be liberally used. And indeed the righteous, though poor, will by their pious conversation do as much good as the rich man by his bounty: so that their lips feed, that is, instruct, counsel, and comfort, many. But the wicked man, being destitute of good principles, intentions, and dispositions; nay, his heart being worthless and full of iniquity, cannot be expected to do good, either by his example or conversation: and at last he will perish as a fool, for want of true wisdom, whatever proficiency he has made in science, and whatever reputation for sagacity he has acquired.

V. 22. In a chapter peculiarly recommending industry, the wise man, or rather the Spirit of God by him, has given a most important admonition in this verse. 'The heathens were prone to imagine all things requisite to happiness to be placed in themselves. But the Scripture every where inculcates, that it is God who giveth wisdom to the wise, and victory to the valiant, and riches to the diligent, and good success to the prudent and potent.' (Bp. Patrick.) In fact, a large majority of nominal Christians, especially the active, sagacious, and managing, in worldly business, are heathens, at least practically, in this respect. Perhaps they acquire their wealth by using many sinister methods; and with it they ensure vanity and vexation. But when riches are given, by the blessing of God, upon the honest industry of one who depends on him and uses them to his glory; they are possessed without perplexing care, or a guilty conscience, or dread of consequences.

V. 23. Foolish and wicked men divert themselves with injuring and disquieting others, or with tempting them to sin: and the greatest impieties or iniquities, which they can commit with present impunity, are to them a laughing matter. But a man of understanding is too wise to act so ridiculously: nay, he takes far more delight in wisdom than they do in mischief.

V. 24. The most overwhelming dread which a wicked man feels of punishment, will certainly come upon him: and the largest desires that the righteous can form of spiritual and eternal blessings, will assuredly be granted. "He," even God, "will grant them." The one can fear nothing so bad, and the other can desire nothing so good, as are really intended for them.

V. 25. The triumphs and boastings of prosperous sinners resemble the short-lived mischievous fury of a whirlwind, which soon spends itself and is gone. But the righteous has an everlasting foundation, trusting in the mercy of God through Christ unto eternal life.

V. 26. As vinegar, or the sour grape, sets the teeth on edge, and as smoke causes the eyes to smart; so the sluggard is a continual vexation to those who employ him.

V. 28. 'The hope of the former,' (the righteous,) concludes in the joyful possession of what he waits for : but the other failing of his expectation, ends his days in sadness.' (Bp. Patrick.) It should also be added, that a well-grounded hope is in itself a source of present gladness : "Rejoicing in hope."

V. 29. By uprightly walking in the way of the Lord, habits of obedience acquire strength : and thus the believer, instead of fainting and wearying, through difficulties or temptations, grows stronger in faith and grace, and goes forward with increasing vigour and delight. Some understand the word to mean courage rather than strength.—"The upright man has great courage and undaunted resolution, when any evil threatens him : but the workers of iniquity are broken with the fear of that destruction which is coming on them." (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 30. Inhabit. The wicked would be glad to have this earth for their perpetual home and inheritance : but it cannot be so, they must die and leave their idols behind them ; and they have no title to that inheritance which Canaan typified.

V. 31. "The mouth of the just shall be fruitful in wisdom." (Old translation.) As the perverseness, lies, malice, slanders, perjuries, and impieties, of a wicked man, might be justly punished by cutting out his tongue : so the froward tongue of the ungodly man shall be silenced, and punished in the flames of hell.

V. 32. The righteous know how to speak what is pleasing to God, in that way which is also most acceptable to men. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-16.

If parents would not experience heaviness from their children, but gladness, they should be very attentive to their education ; both giving them good instructions and setting them good examples : they should far more desire that their children may be wise and pious, than rich or renowned : and they ought to pray for them without ceasing to the Giver of every good and perfect gift. It is likewise important, in the greatest degree, that they should consult the permanent advantage of their children, rather than their inclinations ; and early habituate them to self-denial and industry. For without diligence there can be no wisdom, or even justice : and a sluggard is always a reproach to those who had the care of his education, a vexation to those who employ him, a dead weight on society, and a burden to himself. Young persons also ought to recollect the labour and sorrow which they have already cost their parents ; and consider that they may, nay must, if they behave ill, give them still deeper disquietude and anguish. On the other hand, they should endeavour so to behave, as to prove both a comfort and a credit to them. They should apply to business, with redoubled alacrity, from this motive especially, that, if needful, they may be able to support their parents during their declining years. Opportunities once lost can seldom be recalled. In temporal concerns, "he who dealeth with a slack hand becomes poor," though he had fair prospects and considerable property : so many, highly favoured with religious advantages, will sink into final misery through sloth and procrastination. Indeed partial negligence will impoverish the soul, and prevent the Christian from enjoying that confidence and consolation, and being honoured with that usefulness, with which his more diligent brother is favoured. Nay, sloth and self-indulgence are here far more culpable and pernicious, and diligence far more valuable, than in the trifles of this world : for riches are not to be compared with righteousness, or temporal things with eternal. Riches, how vast soever, when connected, (as the case is too generally,) with wickedness, cannot eventually profit any man : nor can the righteous, in any wise, want what is good for him, either here or hereafter. The confidence that the wealthy generally place in affluence, will certainly disappoint them : for the Lord will cast their idolized treasure away with disdain, 'in the hour of death and in the day of judgment : ' and how worthless are all advantages which must forsake us when we most need their help ! But then, the righteousness of the despised servants of God will appear in its inestimable value : and all will either envy or congratulate them. In the mean time, should they be called to hard labour and mean fare, even this shall conduce to their good. It is not easy to estimate the blessings which the righteous enjoy, in answer to the prayers of their brethren, while the confusion and frivolous pleas of the wicked, when attempting to palliate their crimes, form an awful anticipation of their unspeakable anguish, when they shall stand speechless before the judge, and be sent away into everlasting punishment. Indeed, it is of no consequence to any man, either in heaven or hell, what his fellow-creatures say or think of him : but it is our duty to honour the memory of the righteous, and in general they are honoured after their decease, competition, and envy, and enmity, dying with them ; and this honour is a token of their felicity in a better world : while infamy commonly is, and always ought to be, the lot of the wicked, and it will certainly be their doom in the eternal state. It is of vast moment, exactly to discriminate the characters of the righteous and the wicked : and we can hardly touch on any subject which does not direct us in so doing. The wise in heart, that is the righteous, first practises what he has learned, and then speaks to the edification of his neighbours : but the wicked is loquacious and vain-glorious ; and he talks, sometimes fluently and plausibly, on the deepest mysteries, while he neglects the plainest and most important duties. Indeed there is no small number of these “prating fools,” even among those that profess, nay, preach, the Gospel. Yet ~~are~~ they all, every moment, liable to fall into destruction. Again, the righteous treasures up useful knowledge ; and bestows pains to render all he knows useful ; and if he has any genius or eloquence, he employs it in recommending truth and enforcing holiness. But the wicked, according to the particular kind of vice to which he is addicted, perversely uses his talents to varnish over crimes, and palliate enormities. The righteous man simply and honestly walks in the ways of God : but the hypocrite has always something in his conduct, which requires concealment and dreads detection. The righteous man is long-suffering, forgiving, and kind ; tender to the faults of others, and only severe on his own. He follows peace, and the love of his brother is a mantle to “cover all sins :” but the wicked is clement to himself, and severe on others. Self-love is his mantle to cover his own sins ; envy or hatred prompts him to expose the faults of others, and to stir up strife and contention. And if he be rich, this increases his vain confidence and carnal security, while he despises the poor, though pious, instead of relieving their distresses, and giving them encouragement and protection. And finally, while the righteous employ the fruit of their labours in doing good : the wicked spend their estates, or large incomes, “in making provision for the flesh to fulfil the “lusts thereof.”

V. 17—32.

Whatever may have been the character and conduct of a man hitherto ; if indeed he begins seriously to receive the instruction of the sacred oracles, and to obey them, he is in the way of life, or shall soon find admission at the strait gate : but, alas ! multitudes, having gone wrong, are determined to proceed, however palpable and egregious their errors. Thus they refuse reproof and hate the reprover ; and this so discourages numbers, that they leave men to the most fatal mistakes, for fear of offending them. So that the world is little stored with such as can and will give, and such as meekly and humbly receive, the reproof of life. Alas ! flattery and slander are far more common : and they who hide hatred with lying lips, generally spread slanders also, and often concerning the very persons whom they most flatter. But the word of inspiration has called such men fools ; and the day of judgment will show how justly. How different the character of the truly wise and righteous man ! He learns to bridle and govern his tongue ; and to avoid all corrupt, false, ill-tempered, and useless conversation : yet he will not, in refraining his lips, from a conviction that “in the multitude of words there wanteth “not sin ;” neglect to improve the talent intrusted to him. Wisdom is found in his lips ; his words are as choice silver, enriching, and as wholesome provisions feeding, many. His wise counsels and cautions, his reproofs, instructions and encouragements, will be acceptable and useful : and while his grand object is to glorify God, he aims also to “please all men for their edification,” and to propose truth in the most winning and attractive manner.— This is his joy and delight : thus his lips are fruitful in wisdom, and many will remember his words, for their good, when his tongue is silent in the grave. But what a contrast to this character is that of the fool, whose joy and sport is sin and mischief ! Who pours forth frowardness, malice, lies, reproaches, and profaneness, without fear or concern ; and the effect of whose daily conversation, in exciting contentions, and propagating delusions and impiety, exceeds all calculation ! Indeed it is the character of the fool, to use his scantling of capacity in doing mischief. Here alone he manifests any sagacity or ingenuity : and here indeed a little ingenuity will go far ; “for behold how “great a matter a little fire kindleth.” Men that are slow to hear, swift to speak, swift to wrath ; implacable in resentments, and delighting in contentions, may for a while be very successful in mischief : but it will all soon fall on their own heads ; and unless they be brought to deep repentance, they will be driven away as by a whirlwind, and their worst fears coming upon them, will sink them into final destruction and misery. But the hope of the righteous is gladness. If the Lord see good he can give them wealth, and exempt them from the sorrow and vexation attending ungodly prosperity. He can prolong their days, while vice shortens the lives of wretched multitudes. He will make their diligence acceptable and useful, while disgrace attaches to the slothful. He will give them strength and courage in his ways : and they shall not be moved for ever, being built on an immoveable foundation. “This “is the heritage of the servants of the LORD ; and their “righteousness is of me, saith the LORD.”

NOTES.

CHAP. XI. V. 1. (Note, Deut. xxv. 13—16.) ‘Under this word,’ (balances,) ‘he condemneth all false ‘weights, measures, and deceits.’ The strong language of Scripture, in many places, on this subject, demands the most serious consideration of all persons engaged in buying and selling. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2. A proud conceit of a man’s own ability or excellency, accompanied with boastings and arrogant contempt of others, commonly makes way for his being put to shame, by having his ignorance and insufficiency detected and exposed. ‘When a man forgetteth himself, and thinketh to ‘be exalted above his vocation, then God bringeth him to ‘confusion.’ Indeed pride is always incompatible with 23 The ^qdesire of the righteous is only good: but ^rthe expectation of the wicked is wrath.

24 There is ^sthat scattereth, and yet increaseth; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, ^tbut it tendeth to poverty.

V. 17. The compassionate, forgiving, and friendly man, in every sense best ensures his own comfort and happiness: whereas cruelty to others, in its very nature, as well as consequences, renders a man miserable; a torment to himself, as well as to his family and neighbours.

V. 18. They who attempt to deceive others deceive themselves; and are ruined by the very measures from which they expected the greatest advantage: but "patient continuance in well-doing" has a happy event, far more uniformly than good husbandry and good seed secure a good crop of corn; for the faithfulness of God to his promises ensures the gracious reward.

V. 19. "Thus righteousness to life: and he that pursueth evil to death." The connexion with the preceding verse seems to be preserved. It can hardly be supposed, that in all these contrasts between life and death, temporal prosperity or adversity is exclusively meant; when the words, in other parts of the Scripture, denote eternal happiness or misery.

V. 20. (Notes, vi. 12—19. Marg. Ref.)

V. 21. 'Though wicked men conspire, and join all their forces together; yet all their combination and power shall not free them from just punishment.' (Bp. Hall.) On the contrary, God is pleased to protect and bless the posterity of his faithful servants, in order to put honour on those who have honoured him.

V. 22. A costly ornament of gold in the snout of a swine, would be continually employed in raking in the filth and mire: thus beauty, in a woman void of prudence and virtue, is disgraced by subserving the basest and most ruinous crimes.

V. 23. The righteous only desire what is good in itself and beneficial to others; and this they may confidently hope to obtain: but the wicked, conscious of their selfish and vile motives and objects, can only expect the heavy wrath of God, and indeed are often "consumed with terrors."

reluctant to speak of it, or mentions it with caution and candour.

V. 13. A tale-bearer. The word signifies a trafficker in 'his neighbour's fame and honour.' As a merchant carries about his goods for the sake of gain, so he carries about words, or rumours; if perhaps he get advantage by them; but often from a certain levity and curiosity: it may be added, and proud malevolence.—Scandalous intelligence, true or false, is the article in which the tale-bearer deals: he is a travelling pedlar, vending such wares: whatever therefore he discovers of this kind, he publishes, let who will be ruined or disgraced. But a man of fidelity conceals those secrets with which he is intrusted: and will not disclose what he knows, by any means, when it may injure another's peace or credit; except the honour of God, and the good of society require it.

V. 14. When affairs, either public or private, are conducted with rashness, and directed by resentment or other corrupt passions, nothing but ruin can be expected. But when many wise and experienced men are consulted, and their counsel is deliberately and impartially considered, before a determination is taken, there is a reasonable prospect of safety and success.—'They who have no government fall as leaves; but safety is found in much counsel.' (Septuagint.)—A ship without a pilot is the figure employed; and the abundance of good counsel, rather than the number consulted, is stated as the ground of safety.

V. 15. (Note, vi. 1—5.) A Stranger, 'whose conversation he knoweth not.' 'He doth not, without judgment and consideration of the circumstances, put himself in danger.'

V. 16. A pious and discreet woman is as careful of her chastity and reputation, as men are of their riches: and she will acquire and preserve the esteem and affection of her husband, and the respect of all around her, when old age has effaced her beauty; even as strong men keep possession of the wealth which they have once obtained.

V. 24, 25. "There are those, who, sowing their own, make it more; and those who gather, and are impoverished." (Sept.) Liberality, exercised from right motives, is sowing seed, and God gives the increase generally even in temporal things: but he that withholds, when a just and right occasion offers, 'that is, the niggard,' seldom prospers much even in this world. For God metes to men in their own measure: and bad crops, bad debts, expensive sickness, and a variety of similar deductions, soon amount to more than liberal alms would have done; while if God see it best, large increase, flourishing trade, kind friends, and various other supplies or savings, soon reimburse the expenses of genuine charity.

V. 26. 'He that hoardeth corn in a time of scarcity, on purpose to raise the price, shall fall into the popular hatred, and have many a curse.' (Bp. Patrick.) In such distressing seasons, there are individuals who refuse to sell, nay, who hoard up provisions, in a cruel hope of enhancing the price still more: but they not only incur the public odium, (in which great multitudes of innocent characters are commonly involved;) but are very generally losers by their avarice, as well as exposed to the wrath of God. Whereas he, who sells at a moderate price, is commended by those who are relieved, and best consults his own benefit as well as the public good. The original word, however, at least equally includes those that give, or break their bread to the hungry; who certainly are more generally blessed and prayed for.

V. 27. The word rendered diligently, signifies the morning. He that from the time he rises, studies nothing but how to do good, shall obtain favour both of God and man: but he whose business is to do mischief, shall draw upon himself the evil he designs against others.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 28. 'He whose confidence in riches makes him unjust, and unmerciful, shall fall into decay: but they whose pious dependence on God makes them just and charitable, like a flourishing tree, shall thrive and prosper.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 29. Many, by their furious passions and contentiousness, or by their pride and prodigality, avarice and other vices, become a plague and vexation to their families: but they can expect nothing save disappointment and trouble for their own portion: and, in general, they who are destitute of prudence or industry, will soon become servants to those who are more diligent and discreet.

V. 30. The good example, pious discourse, wise instructions, fervent prayers, and zealous good works, of the righteous, become exceedingly beneficial to those around them: they are as fruit from the Tree of life; they promote the salvation of sinful men. And as immortal souls are valuable beyond all estimation, he who thus wins souls and allures them into the way of eternal life, is emphatically the wise man: he proposes to himself the noblest end, he uses the only proper means, he perseveres and is prospered by God himself.

V. 31. Even the righteous, when they offend, shall be recompensed on earth with sharp corrections: much more then will the wicked, who dare the vengeance of heaven, meet at length with the due reward of their impiety and iniquity.—It is remarkable that St. Peter has quoted the Septuagint translation of this verse. "If the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and sinner appear?"

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

The righteous God, who weigheth all our actions in an impartial balance, will never allow his subjects to defraud each other with impunity. It is, alas! very common for men to give short weight and measure, and in various ways to cheat and rob their neighbours; and numberless crimes of this kind here escape detection and punishment; but let it not be overlooked, that they "are an abomination to the LORD;" and that they will be produced at the day of judgment, as decisive proofs of the hypocrisy of multitudes, who have been zealous, in their way, for evangelical doctrines. This is so far from a light matter, that it is a most grievous oppression; and thousands of the poor are sometimes deprived almost of necessary food to enrich a few fraudulent dealers. But let it be remembered, that "he shall have judgment without mercy, who hath showed no mercy:" on the other hand, he that is kept from growing rich, by conscientiously avoiding all exaction, and acting with strict honesty, may recollect that "a just weight is the LORD's delight." Indeed, "the integrity of the upright guides them" far from such fraudulent practices: while the perverseness of transgressors destroys them, for "the wicked shall fall by their own wickedness," and be ensnared by Satan, through their own covetousness and selfishness. But what are those wonderful advantages derived from riches, that men are universally so prone to seize the golden bait? In times of public calamities, they generally expose the possessor to peculiar danger; they will not profit in the day of wrath; and he who trusteth in them, will certainly be left without resource in the hour of death and the day of judgment. How much more valuable then is that "righteousness which delivereth from death !" How reasonable to "seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness !" Every one's conscience testifies, that "when a wicked man dieth, his expectation perisheth," and all his hopes expire in eternal despair : and even the irreligious are constrained, when an eminently pious person is removed, to allow that he is delivered from trouble, and gone to a happier world. These salutary convictions might be more generally productive of abiding good ; did not "the hypocrite with his mouth destroy his neighbour ;" persuading the unstable to rest satisfied with a name, a notion, a form of godliness, an easy worldly religion. May God grant to every reader that "knowledge, by which the just is delivered."—Indeed, the same conduct which best secures our own happiness, is most conducive to the good of others : and if a truly wise and pious man be advanced to authority, many will eventually have great cause for rejoicing : whereas the prosperity of the wicked is a public calamity, and their downfall a most desirable event. Even in private, nay, in obscure, situations, the righteous are both blessed and blessings : by their example and prayers, public calamities are often prevented or retarded ; they are the light and the salt of the earth ; the fatal tendency of wicked counsellors, and impious opinions industriously circulated, are counteracted by their means. And who can say, to what extent such mischiefs would proceed, were all the righteous expelled from any country ? They who are void of understanding despise their neighbours ; and go about as tale-bearers, slanderers, and betrayers of secrets, to the unspeakable mischief of society : but the wise and righteous hold their peace, if they cannot speak to good purpose : they scorn to betray such as confide in them, or even to injure them whose infirmities they witness, and they pity such as are not entitled to their esteem. True religion, however, should be carefully distinguished from self-righteousness, for "when pride cometh, then cometh shame : but with the lowly is wisdom : " and also from all kinds of antinomian licentiousness. But, as in kingdoms "where no counsel is, the people perish : " so it is in this respect : unless able and faithful ministers are raised up to instruct mankind, almost all run into one or the other of these fatal extremes. What need then is there for us to pray "the Lord of the harvest to send forth labourers into his harvest !" for "in the multitude of these counsellors is safety : " and what pains should all ministers take, that they may be wise and faithful counsellors in these important concerns. And how should all consult such as are approved for integrity and knowledge, especially in difficult cases, where their present comfort, and usefulness, and eternal salvation, are deeply concerned !

V. 15—31.

True religion is true wisdom : and while it prompts to all justice and mercy, it teaches men to avoid whatever is rash and pernicious. The wise and pious Christian will be very careful not to commit himself, by "becoming surety for a stranger ;" not only lest he should smart for it, but lest his family and friends should be involved with him, and his ability to relieve the poor should be diminished. Unless, therefore, the case be peculiar, he will stand aloof, knowing that "he who hateth suretyship is sure." At the same time, he will endeavour in this world of sin and misery to do what he can towards the relief of distress and the communication of happiness. Indeed this is one of the most pleasant of human enjoyments. While the selfish and sordid, the envious and malicious, the sensual, profligate, and dissipated, are tortured, in various ways, by their own passions, and by the effects of them, and trouble their families by their misconduct, "the merciful man doeth good to his own soul." He doubles his own enjoyments, secures a blessing on his undertakings and possessions, has inward peace and confidence, and the satisfaction of knowing, that many are blessing him and praying for him. By diligently seeking the good of others, he procures favour from man, and obtains assurance of the Lord's merciful acceptance.—"He soweth righteousness, and his reward is sure." Even if he be poor, his "desire is only good," and his prayers and example will be useful. According to the degree in which God has prospered him, he waters others, and shall himself be abundantly watered : and experience proves, that they who on Christian principles abound in liberality, even beyond what rigid prudence would allow, so far from impoverishing their families, are generally prospered in a remarkable manner. On the other hand, they who profess to "know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ," and learn, by hints at least, from various quarters, that they are thought to "withhold more than is meet," and plead that they cannot afford to be charitable, should consider whether God does not withhold his blessing from their temporal concerns on this very ground ; and whether they ought not to prove him by adopting a more liberal plan. Indeed, almost in every thing, that is best for us which is best for our neighbours ; in giving, lending, selling, or the contrary, covetousness commonly defeats its own ends ; and he who grasps at unfair advantages, comes short of such as he might conscientiously and creditably have secured. This indeed is one effect of human selfishness, and exposes its folly : yet it still continues to influence the conduct of almost all men, and often in circumstances of such cruelty as are shocking to relate, and amidst general execration.—The common excuse indeed for covetousness is regard to a man's family : yet this should, in fact, teach a contrary lesson ; for "the seed of the righteous shall be delivered" from those evils which overwhelm the posterity of the wicked. So that the most prosperous sinner, in every sense, "worketh a deceitful work : " he "pursueth evil to his own death : " and as "they who are of a froward heart are an abomination to the Lord ; " it must certainly follow, that "though hand join in hand, the

3 A man ^eshall not be established by wickedness: but ^fthe root of the righteous shall not be moved.

“wicked shall not be unpunished.” For if “the righteous be recompensed in the earth,” if God sharply corrects his children, in whom he delighteth, what will be the doom of his determined enemies? Alas! vast numbers throng the broad road to destruction; and keep one another in countenance and in spirits, notwithstanding the awful warnings given them in the sacred Scriptures: while the narrow way to life is still but little frequented. But they who have found the way of life should be unwearied in their endeavours to win over others, to accompany them in it. They should study to recommend the Gospel by a harmless and kind, as well as pious behaviour; and by a constant attention to all the proprieties of relative life: and they ought to use every means, consistent with their station in society, to make their connexions and neighbours wise unto salvation. As one soul is more valuable than the whole world; and as successful endeavours for the conversion of sinners is a peculiar evidence of true wisdom; so no disappointments or unmerited reproaches should prevent the Christian’s persevering in his benevolent and zealous efforts; for if at length he prevails but in one instance, this will amply make amends for all his past discouragements. In this view how good is the work of the ministry! How honourable and useful the diligent and faithful minister! What encouragement is there for all, employed in this sacred service, to labour incessantly, even amidst contempt and hardship! Here especially “the fruit of the righteous is a tree of life:” and it will soon appear, that “they who win souls” are far wiser, than they who heap up wealth: for he who “trusteth in his riches shall fall; but the righteous shall flourish as a branch.” Indeed we cannot turn any way without seeing the excellency of the righteous: it may be useful to many readers to compare the prudent and pious matron, who retains her reputation, and grows in the affections of those related to her, and increases in respect, when external accomplishments are wearing out; who often wins to the paths of holiness the souls of her children, or servants, and perhaps even that of her husband; with the fair woman that wants discretion, whose beauty only serves to render her more conspicuously infamous and mischievous. Let the young then contemplate this contrast: and seek wisdom and grace, as the only enduring embellishments, and recommendations to constancy of affection and esteem. Finally, let us all desire and pursue those blessings, which our Surety purchased for sinners by his sufferings and death; and study to imbibe his instructions, to copy his example, and to keep his commandments.

V. 2. A good, &c. That is, a man of a kind, friendly, and merciful disposition. Where this is genuine and habitual, and pervades a man’s whole conduct, without allowed exceptions of persons or cases, it must be the effect of divine grace: and such a person will be proportionably favoured by the Lord, both with inward peace, and a blessing on his undertakings. But he who allows himself to devise wickedness, waiting for an opportunity of committing it; or who covers selfish and vicious designs under a profession of religion, friendship, or affection, will be condemned by the righteous Judge of the world.

V. 3. The prosperity, which is obtained by wickedness, cannot be permanently established by any sagacity or power: but the righteous resemble trees that strike deep root in the earth, and grow up gradually; the branches of which may be shaken by furious tempests, but they are secured by the root from material detriment. ‘They are so grounded in the favour of God, that their root shall prosper continually.’ (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4. A prudent and faithful woman, who has strength of mind to govern her passions, and who diligently attends to domestic affairs, will prove a great comfort to her husband, and conduce more to his credit than the wearing of a crown could do. But a contentious, imperious, extravagant, improvident, or adulterous woman, is like a disease which wastes the bones. She will injure his character, ruin his circumstances, prevent the proper care of his family, lead him into temptation, drive him into bad company and excess, or perhaps shorten his days, by the inward anguish that she occasions.

V. 5. (Note, Psalm cxix. 113.) The righteous habitually devise, contrive, and purpose those things that are good and just; they desire to know and to do the will of God, and have no sinister or malicious intentions covered over with fair professions. But the wicked secretly contrive how to compass their interested purposes, and to avoid detection and disgrace on account of their concealed iniquities; they consult with themselves how to over-reach, and obtain undue advantages in bargains; and they would commit more fraud, injustice, or other wickedness, if they were not afraid of hurting their reputations, or of falling under the lash of human laws.

V. 6. Wicked men frequently consult together concerning the most effectual means of gratifying their avarice, ambition, revenge, lust, or enmity against the servants of God; and they are ready to lie in wait for blood, when they can do it with impunity. Hence unrighteous wars, massacres, assassinations, oppressions, persecutions, and murders of various kinds, have prevailed in the world, ever since Cain lay in wait for the blood of righteous Abel: and far more innocent blood would be shed, were the restraint of human laws removed. But the mouth of the upright, pleading their own cause with wisdom that cannot be gainsayed, often delivers them from false accusers and persecutors: and they frequently give such information, cautions, and counsels to those who are laid in wait for, as deliver them also from the danger.

V. 7. When ungodly men have attained the summit of prosperity: through the fickleness of their patrons, or of the multitude and envy of rivals; through the instability of human affairs, the failure of their projects, or the detection of their wickedness; or through their insolence, cruelty, and rashness, they are often overthrown at once, their families and party are ruined with them, and they are gone and neglected in a very short time. (Notes, &c. Esth. vi. vii.) But the moderate prosperity of the righteous stands on a firmer basis, and, by the blessing of God, is often continued to their descendants.

V. 8. Whatever transient reputation a man may acquire for his external or superficial accomplishments, or even for abilities, learning, and achievements; if he be of a perverse disposition, and go on in the crooked ways of iniquity and impiety, he will at length sink into contempt. But the man of true wisdom and piety, though for a time neglected, will at length assuredly be approved, commended, and had in honour. The first clause is literally, "According to ° the mouth of his wisdom a man shall be praised:" and the capacity of giving wise counsel, in an agreeable and impressive manner, seems especially intended.

V. 9. Many persons, who have been brought up in the higher ranks of life, but have not proportionable wealth, are too proud to employ themselves in inferior occupations: and thus they become miserably poor, want things necessary for themselves and families, sponge upon their friends, and even defraud their creditors, to maintain a vain appearance of dignity. But he who is despised for engaging in a mean employment and wearing a homely appearance: but by so doing can have the comforts of life without dependence or dissingenuous arts, is more happy, wise, useful, and respectable, than "he that honoureth himself and lacketh bread." The old translation, (with which many versions agree,) gives a different sense to this proverb. "He that is despised, and is his own servant, is better than he that boasteth himself and wanteth bread." The poor man, who is despised, yet lives by his honest labour, is more valuable and happy than the proud boaster.

V. 10. A pious man is always compassionate, and would deem it cruelty to put even an animal to needless pain, or to abuse those useful creatures, which conduce so much to the comfort of life. But wicked men are hard-hearted and cruel even in their tenderest mercies. Thus they deem themselves very merciful, when their oppressions are not quite so cruel as they might be: and they often affect to speak of the poor and distressed, as being very well used, and in a very desirable situation; when they themselves could not endure such treatment for a single day. (Marg. Ref.) 'It is very laudable to exercise kindness to ° wards brute creatures, that we keep ourselves the more re- ° mote from all manner of cruelty towards men.' (Grotius.)

V. 12. When the ungodly see others prosper by iniquity, they straightway wish that they could act with similar ingenuity, or obtain the same opportunities: they would be glad of the advantages of sin, forgetting or despising its guilt and after-reckoning; and they are not so great plunderers or cheats as some are, merely because they cannot or dare not. But the root of divine grace, in the heart of the righteous, produceth good desires and purposes, and yieldeth more comfort to themselves, besides doing much good to others. 'The wicked man affects those methods of ° fraudulent invention, which he sees some fraudulent op- ° pressors use to their advantage.' (Bp. Hall.)

V. 13. Perjuries, treasonable words, defamations, and lies, often involve wicked men, however subtle, in most perplexing troubles, and they are snared by the transgression of their own lips; while a frank and open conduct eventually tends to credit and comfort.

V. 14. When a man speaks that which is useful to others, he receives satisfaction from it himself: by counselling and instructing others, he edifies himself; and God will graciously recompense the good words and works of his servants, as well as punish the wicked according to their deserts.

V. 15. A fool is so conceited and headstrong, that he is incapable of taking warning or counsel; and he is determined to vindicate all he does, and persist in all his rash enterprises, as if he were infallible. But a wise man distrusts his own judgment and heart; he is afraid of being misled, and desires to be convinced of his errors and misconduct; and so he hearkens to instruction, that he may grow wiser and wiser.

V. 16. A foolish man is soon made angry, and is hasty in expressing his resentment, without regard to company or circumstances; and thus he is ever embroiled in quarrels, and running into mischief. But a prudent man carefully stifles his resentment, and avoids such words and actions as would afterwards cover him with shame; or he covers the shameful behaviour of such as abuse him, and lets it pass unnoticed. The old translation is more literal; 'a fool in a day shall be known by his anger,' &c. The word rendered prudent, commonly means cunning: and so may point out the shrewd crafty man, who seems to take no notice of affronts, because he designs hereafter either to revenge them, or to turn them in some way to his own advantage.

V. 17. He who, in a court of justice, unreservedly testifies to the whole truth, subverts the cause of equity, and assists the magistrate in decreeing righteous judgment: but false witnesses impose on him, and may thus lead him unintentionally to decide in favour of the wicked. The maxim holds equally good, in many other cases, when a full and fair declaration of the truth effectually subverts the cause of justice and piety.

V. 18, 19. False accusations and perjuries may murder like a sword, or rob a man of his estate: and calumnies may wound his credit, or excite suspicions and contentions destructive of domestic comfort, and of the peace of his mind. But the tongue of the wise is employed in composing differences, in vindicating aspersed characters, in comforting the distressed, and in promoting justice, piety, and charity. And he who thus makes truth his standard, and equity and peace his aim, will gradually establish his own character, and will not have cause to fear any investigation: but lies and deceit only serve a present purpose, expose a man to speedy detection, and render him suspected and distrusted in every thing.

V. 20. They who imagine evil dare not openly avow their designs; so that malice and mischief are always attended with dissimulation, and are productive of terrors and perplexities: but such as consult the peace and happiness of others, have joy and serenity in their own minds.

V. 21. This verse may be rendered, "The just shall not be given up to any iniquity; but the wicked are full of mischief." The Septuagint renders the last clause 'nothing iniquitous shall please.'

V. 22. (Note, vi. 16-19.)

V. 23. Men of prudence and discretion make no ostentation of their knowledge; but reserve it for suitable occasions, and show it in their conduct: but ignorant and frivolous persons are generally vain-glorious, and by attempting to display their wit or learning, they commonly proclaim their own emptiness and folly.

V. 24. Diligence has a natural tendency to advance men in society, and will generally conduct them to eminence in their occupations, or to influence or authority in the community: but the slothful are never likely to be any thing but dependents or slaves. The word rendered slothful, may mean deceitful; and indeed sloth is commonly an inlet to dishonesty, which exposes a man to penalties, confinement, and severe treatment. (Note, x. 4.)

V. 25. Distress of conscience, sharp afflictions, and discouraging fears, deject the heart, and unfit a man for his duty: but a kind and encouraging word may often give a favourable turn to his thoughts, inspire him with hope, and animate him to activity; this maxim points out an easy and cheap way of being useful.

V. 26. Though wicked men cannot but see that the righteous are more excellent than their neighbours, and in general more abound in comforts: yet the pleasures and gains of their iniquities seduce their minds, and cause them to continue in their disgraceful, perilous, and wretched courses.

V. 27. The slothful (or deceitful) man makes no good use of the advantages that Providence throws in his way, and has no comfort of them: if at any time he make a vigorous exertion, or seem successful, he loses all the benefit for want of perseverance, and so he brings nothing to perfection. But the possessions of a diligent man are valuable to himself, and to others also.

V. 28. What is the meaning of this verse, if Solomon confined his views, as some would persuade us, to this mortal life and dying world?

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-14.

The degree of our love to any object may fairly be measured by our value for the means of obtaining it. He who loves science loves study, and prizes information. He who chooses wisdom and grace, values the word and ordinances of God; and is thankful even for reproofs, which conduce to his improvement. On the other hand, the man whose main object it is to gratify his appetites and passions, cannot but despise instruction and hate reproof: and consequently he chooses to reside in places and frequent companies, where he is least likely to meet with any check in his evil courses. The Lord seeth, and will at length discover to the whole world, the secret thoughts of every heart. Then the contrivances, speculations, and desires of those who devise evil, will be condemned, though they have never been reduced to practice: and the benevolent intentions, the pious meditations, the plans and counsels of the righteous to do good, though here frustrated, will be made known and graciously rewarded. And when the concealed part of every character shall be made public and manifest; the difference between the righteous and the wicked will appear so evident and immense, that none shall have one word to speak against the sentence awarded to each of them. Let us for a moment realize the idea of every word that men have spoken, during their whole lives, being called over at the day of judgment. What a discovery will thus be made of men's hearts! Not to dwell on the vain and corrupt communication which proceeds out of the mouths of the ungodly: all the secret cabals of those who lie in wait for blood, all the perjuries and calumnies by which men accomplish their cruel or unrighteous purposes; all their lies, flatteries, reproaches, proud boastings, and blasphemies; when made known before the assembled world, will form such a discovery as must overwhelm the wicked with unutterable confusion. On the other hand, the pious discourse and wise counsels of the righteous, by which they rescued many from snares and dangers, or endeavoured to be useful to their souls; and every good and profitable word which they have spoken, will be made known to their joy, and contribute to evince their real character. Thus they shall be satisfied with good by the fruit of their lips, as well as recompensed according to the work of their hands. Even those men of the world, who are the wisest in their generation, are unable to establish themselves by their wickedness: and frequently they and their families fail and perish, as rapidly as they at first prospered. But the righteous, being rooted in the favour of God, and secured by his promises, shall never be moved: they are fruitful and useful, and the generation of the upright shall be blessed. Many of them indeed are poor in this world, and earn their bread by hard labour: but having food and raiment, they are content and satisfied. They think no honest labour a disgrace: and while the proud and slothful, and such as follow after vain persons, affect the appearance of affluence, honour themselves and despise the industrious, often sink into deep distress; the very persons they slight, possess very many comforts, and also find something to spare to relieve the indigent. Again, who are they that enjoy most comfort, and prove the greatest blessings, in domestic life? Mark the difference between the pious and prudent woman, who is a crown to her husband; and her that maketh ashamed, and is as rottenness in his bones! Can any one seriously consider this subject, and endure the thought of ever becoming the disgrace, misery, and ruin, of the nearest relation on earth? Yet vice and folly commonly produce this dreadful consequence: and there is no security against it; or reasonable hope of becoming creditable, comfortable, and useful, in any relation of life, without piety and heavenly wisdom. How then are they deluded, who in forming the conjugal union, prefer beauty, wit, or external accomplishments, to substantial excellency of character! Indeed the real and consistent Christian not only endeavours to make his relations, domestics, and neighbours comfortable; but he sympathizes in the sufferings of the very animals; is incapable of cruelty to them, will not allow others to abuse them, and takes pleasure in seeing them enjoy that kind of happiness of which they are capable. Surely then he will never desire the net of evil men: but rather at any time renounce his own indulgence and interest, than add to the miseries of human beings, in any part of the globe. But the tender mercies of the wicked are cruel. They lavish outward favours, while they would seduce the objects of their selfish affection to those crimes which are most ruinous in this world and the next. They are prodigal to the worthless and harsh to the industrious. They exact by merciless oppression from one set of men, what they bestow on another, with ostentatious liberality. They weep over the tragic tale of imaginary woe, and are callous to real misery. They affect the praise of philanthropy, by a specious conduct abroad; while their harsh spirit and furious passions, render their own families a scene of confusion and misery! It is indeed most wonderful, how generally these truths, or rather facts, are overlooked or forgotten; and how little effect they produce on the judgment and conduct even of professed Christians! But at length "a man shall certainly be commended according to his wisdom," "the righteous shall come out of trouble," "and he that is of a perverse spirit shall be despised."

V. 15-28.

In proportion as men are foolish, they commonly are self-sufficient. "Their way," however rash and absurd in itself, "is right in their own eyes:" and instead of growing wiser by hearkening to prudent counsel, they consider every intimation that they are mistaken as an almost unpardonable affront. The first appearance of this spirit should be carefully checked, in young people especially; for when it has got the ascendancy, there is little hope of repressing it. (Note, ix. 7, 8.) When persons of this character take offence, their wrath is presently known, by passionate language, upbraidings, and slanders, if not by furious endeavours to revenge themselves. They "speak like the piercings of a sword;" not caring whose character, interest, or comfort they wound or destroy: but in thus pouring out of the abundance of their hearts, they proclaim their own foolishness, and will soon be filled with mischief. "Lying lips are abomination to the LORD: but they that deal truly are his delight." Among the several ways in which this maxim may be improved to practical purposes it peculiarly applies to the ministers of religion. "He, who in this respect speaketh truth showeth forth righteousness; but a false witness deceit." And that minister, who "shuns not to declare the whole counsel of God," and "keeps back nothing profitable;" who never wounds, but in order to heal; who injures no man's credit or peace, as with the piercings of the sword of an enemy; but often lays open the conscience with the faithful wounds of a friendly surgeon, to prepare the way for heavenly consolations: this man, however despised and hated at present, will at length "receive the crown and glory which fade not away." In this case especially, "the lip of truth shall be established for ever: but the lying tongue is but for a moment." Even the silence of a pious man, while he represses resentment, meekly endures provocation, hides the shame that folly would expose; conceals the knowledge which ostentation would display, or frowns silent disapprobation where a mere direct reproof would be improper, is an evidence of wisdom, and full of instruction. In short, in every thing, "the righteous is more excellent than his neighbour," and far more happy also. While "deceit in the heart of those who imagine evil" often fills them with alarm and anguish, to the counsellors of peace is joy; and when the good words or kind actions which they speak make glad the hearts of the afflicted or desponding, they share the comfort which they communicate. The diligence, modesty, prudence, and integrity, which true religion teaches, procure men influence and respect, frequently among such as are themselves irreligious; and so advance them to desirable and useful situations: while sloth, prodigality, and duplicity, tend directly to abject dependence, deep distress, or general contempt, even in this world. These things indeed are undeniable; and many ungodly men have transient convictions, nay, sometimes an abiding opinion, that their pious neighbours or relations are and will be happier than themselves: but they are seduced by evil companions and indulged passions, and they remain the slaves of sin. Their temporary efforts at reformation, with all their knowledge and advantages, prove unavailing, for want of resolution and perseverance: they either adopt false principles, and so are hardened in presumption; or, being baffled in their feeble and heartless endeavours, they lie down in despondence. O then, let every reader hear the Saviour's call, "and strive to enter in at the strait gate; for many, I say unto you, will seek to enter in and not be able." But happy indeed are they who are walking in the way of "righteousness;" for in it is life, and in "the path-way" thereof there is no death." Generally, when the wicked take a hasty resolution, or make a vigorous effort, they lose all the benefit for want of persevering diligence and dependence on the Lord: so that whilst the diligent acquire dominion over their passions, the slothful is under tribute to his lusts. Every advantage is precious to the former, but useless or ruinous to the latter; and he is always either buoyed up in presumption, or sunk down into despondency. In short, all the knowledge and convictions of the ungodly settle in something short of a holy life: but the prudent Christian makes no ostentation of his knowledge, except in his exemplary conduct and useful conversation, and in encouraging the dejected to hope in and wait upon the Lord.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIII. V. 1. A young man of prudence and good sense will pay attention to his father's good instruction, and not require reproofs or corrections to induce his obedience: on the contrary, a scorner will not hear, obey, or be influenced by even the severest rebukes.

V. 2. "A man shall eat good things by the fruit of his mouth; but the soul of the trespassers shall suffer violence." (Old Translation.) 'If he use his tongue to the glory of God and the good of his neighbour, God shall bless him.'

V. 3. 'He that looks carefully to his tongue, takes a safe course for preserving his life, which is oft endangered by much and wild talking.' (Bp. Hall.)

V. 4. Sluggard, &c. 'He ever desireth, but taketh no pains to get any thing.' This applies both to things temporal and things eternal. God gives every thing; but in a way of diligence. He works in us to will and do; but, in all things, his order has connected industry and prosperity, sloth and misery.

13 Whoso ^d despiseth the word shall be destroyed: but ^e he that feareth the commandment ^f shall ^g be rewarded.

14 The ^h law of the wise is a fountain of life, ⁱ to depart from the snares of death.

V. 5. A pious man abhors deceit and lies, as detestable in themselves; and he has no occasion for such base means; because he has no bad ends to accomplish: but the wicked endeavour to impose on their neighbours, to conceal their crimes, and to gratify their passions by deceit; till at length they render themselves generally contemptible and odious.

V. 6. (Notes, xi. 3. 5, 6.) 'Wicked contrivances are overthrown by their own iniquity.' (Marg.) (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 7: Many persons make a show of wealth, and live at a great expense, and engage in large concerns, who are indeed possessed of little or no property; and thus they become public cheats. Others, who are very rich, pretend to be, and live as if they were, poor; and thus they bereave themselves and their families of good, and refuse to improve the talents committed to their stewardship. Pharisees and hypocrites also make a show of that piety which they have not, and so impose on others and deceive themselves; whilst some true Christians are always discouraging themselves by groundless fears: and in many instances men impose on multitudes, by pretending to skill which they have not; whereas others through excessive or affected modesty obstruct their own usefulness.

V. 8. Riches often tempt men to rob, or to raise prosecutions against, those who possess them: and then, if they can ransom their lives by parting with their treasures, they think themselves well off. But the poor man is exempt from such rebukes, perils, and terrors; for no one thinks it worth while to lodge an accusation against him, for such purposes: and he commonly escapes best in public calamities. Some indeed take the sentence quite otherwise. 'A rich man when he fears any evil from his enemies, can divert it by a sum of money; but a poor man when he is threatened, dare not stay, but runs away.' (Bp. Patrick.) 'The poor cannot bear the reproach: for by his poverty he is not able to escape the threatenings which the cruel oppressors use against him.'—The latter clause is taken in an unfavourable sense in the first verse: but in other respects the first interpretation seems best grounded.

V. 9. 'The happiness of the just is great and illustrious, like the light of the sun; and increases still to their endless joy, &c.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 10. 'Only by pride will a man engage in contention,' &c. The various quarrels which disquiet the world; whether in families, churches, or communities, or between nations, with all the fatal consequences of them, are in general excited and perpetuated by pride. From that odious principle arise resentment, revenge, envy, and ambition: and though other vicious dispositions excite contentions; yet disputes would more easily be prevented or terminated, if pride did not intervene. Some point of honour must be maintained, some affront must be resented, some rival must be crushed or eclipsed, some renowned character emulated, or some superior equalled and surpassed. But they who hear prudent counsel, will show their wisdom, by avoiding quarrels and disputes. 'They whose minds are infected with a vain opinion of themselves, either cannot see the truth;—or if they do, they will not acknowledge it, for fear they should yield and confess themselves overcome.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 11. Wealth acquired by dishonest practices, such as gaming, cheating, oppression, or subserving the vices and follies of men, is attended with a secret curse which speedily wastes it: and this all sagacious observers of mankind have remarked. But that which is gotten by honest labour, is attended by a blessing, and is likely to endure and increase.

V. 12. When any thing earnestly desired, is long delayed, the mind is fatigued with waiting, the soul becomes feeble and diseased, and often the body shares the malady: but when the desired object is attained, it gives peculiar delight. The expression, "A tree of life," seems to imply that spiritual blessings are especially meant; which are never earnestly sought in vain, and never disappoint the expectation of those who long and wait for them.

V. 13. 'Meaning the word of God, whereby he is admonished of his duty.' 'He who despises and hates divine truth, shall be given up to a strong delusion; but peace shall be conferred on him that reverences the command of God.'

V. 14. The rule by which the wise man regulates his own conduct, and the injunctions that he prescribes to others, are "his laws." In both senses they are a fountain yielding life and happiness, and a guide directing men at a distance from the snares of death.

V. 15. 'The law of the wise is a fountain of life, to depart from the snares of death.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 16. 'The law of the wise is a fountain of life, to depart from the snares of death.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 17. 'The law of the wise is a fountain of life, to depart from the snares of death.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 18. 'The law of the wise is a fountain of life, to depart from the snares of death.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 15. ' Good insight into businesses, and discreet carriage in them, procureth thankful acceptance: but those that take wrong courses cause much trouble and vexation.' (Bp. Hall.) Ungodly men expect to tread a smooth and pleasant path: but their vices have such consequences on their constitutions, circumstances, and reputations, as render their road very rugged and painful: and their misery is increased by stings of conscience, and by the dread of death and judgment.

V. 16. ' Every wise man will work by knowledge, but a fool will spread abroad folly.' (Old Translation.) Wise men deliberate before they act, and conduct their concerns with skill and judgment: but a foolish man exposes himself, by his rash undertakings and imprudent management.

V. 17. A wicked messenger who betrays his trust, or a faithless ambassador who sells the interests of his prince and country, do not more certainly injure others, than expose themselves to infamy and ruin. But the faithful messenger or ambassador gives satisfaction, is useful, and will be honoured and rewarded. This is emphatically applicable to the ambassadors, whom the Lord sends with his message to sinners.

V. 18. (Note 1.) The Septuagint renders the first clause, ' Education taketh away poverty and disgrace.'
 The best method of preserving our children from poverty and shame, is to educate them well.

V. 19. The pleasure and satisfaction, arising from the attainment of a desired object, abundantly compensate for the trouble and self-denial of pursuing it. This especially holds good, in respect of the comforts of true religion.
 But fools, or ungodly men, have so strong and rooted a dislike to repentance, reformation, and religious duties; that they cannot be induced to take the proper method of obtaining these comforts, or even of escaping the wrath to come.

V. 20. It is a hopeful indication of prudence and piety, when wise and good companions are habitually preferred:
 and by continual intercourse with them, good principles are strengthened, good habits formed, and wisdom matured.
 But he that chooses bad company proves his folly, and is in the way of learning and practising more and more all those evils that lead to ruin, temporal and eternal.

V. 21. (Marg. Ref.) The sinner may long escape:
 but evil pursues him, and will at length surely overtake him; as the hounds steadily follow, and after many windings, seize on their prey.

V. 22. The liberal servant of God, whilst he shakes his hands from iniquitous gain, and is not solicitous about riches, and even disperses in charity as if about to impoverish his family, takes the best method of providing for his posterity: for the wealth which wicked men get by crimes, with great labour and inquietude, is laid up for the righteous and their families: and by the secret disposal of providence shall come into their possession, when they have occasion for it.

V. 23. The poor and industrious, who labour to cultivate a little spot of land, often live in a plentiful though homely manner: whilst they who have inherited large estates, are reduced to poverty by negligence, indiscretion, ostentation, and extravagance. In this way the wealth of the covetous hoarder is often in the next generation transferred to the good man's family.

V. 24. The perverseness of our fallen nature renders correction necessary to children. He therefore, who indulges his son, connives at his perverseness, suffers him to contract vicious habits, and to grow stubborn in rebellion, for want of correction; acts as if he hated him: because he permits those diseases of the mind to gather strength, which will prove the sources of inexpressible sorrow to him in this world, and perhaps of eternal misery. Whereas the parent, who wisely loves his child, will early begin to teach him submission, application, and the government of his passions: and having thus bent the tender twig, and established his authority, he will gradually be enabled to rule him more by persuasion and argument, and to treat him with the lenity of a kind and prudent friend. But when children are permitted to get the mastery in their tender years, they can scarcely ever after be taught subjection, and the attempt is often made by a severity which is both perilous and painful.—The word rendered chasteneth is often translated instruction, (18.) ' He that spareth the rod hateth his son; but he that loveth him, diligently educates, or disciplines him.' (Septuagint) The same term being used in the original both of the Old and New Testa-

V. 25. The servants of God are satisfied with their temporal provisions though mean or scanty, and use them with cheerfulness and thankfulness. But the wicked are never satisfied; have no enjoyment of their possessions; and will sink at last into final and eternal want and misery.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

Teachable and dutiful children commonly, if spared, become wise, useful, and prosperous men: but such as scorn reproof, and harden themselves under rebukes and corrections, are likely to be miserable themselves, and causes of misery to others. He who speaketh "that which is good, to the use of edifying," will generally share the comfort and benefit which he imparts: and in every way, the government of the tongue tends exceedingly to the happiness of life; and preserves a man from numberless troubles, temptations, and sins, into which they, "who open wide their lips," fall and often perish. In what various ways, and emphatical language, are we reminded, that sloth tends to dissatisfaction, vexation, and ruin; and industry to credit, prosperity, and comfort! And can we imagine, that these maxims of heavenly wisdom relate only to the affairs of this transient world? Can we doubt, whether the difference between the indolent and the diligent, in spiritual concerns, will or will not be at least equally manifest, both here and hereafter?—The hateful nature likewise of lies and duplicity is shown, in Scripture, in every way most suited to convince and affect us. God hates lies, and the righteous hate lies: for every man of genuine piety abhors and loves what his Lord abhors and loves. Let then such as allow themselves to belie, in their professions of whatever kind, the secret purposes and thoughts of their hearts, look well to themselves: and if they pretend to religion, let them tremble, lest at last they should have their portion with the hypocrites. They may, at present, deceive others and even themselves: but when the whole shall be laid open, (and the awful day approaches,) they will appear loathsome and be overwhelmed with confusion. It does not indeed consist with Christian simplicity, for a man to assume the appearance of wealth, knowledge, or skill in any profession, which he does not possess; or even to deny, under an affectation of modesty, the talents which he ought to improve, to the benefit of his brethren and the honour of God.—But righteousness preserveth the upright in the middle path; and an honest desire to do the Lord's will secures a man from important mistakes, and from that wickedness which overthroweth the sinner, far better than the most exact casuistical decisions. In all things, the knowledge, grace, and success of the righteous, are a source of increasing joy, which will be perfected in heavenly felicity; but the lamp of the wicked will soon be extinguished, and his transient mirth be exchanged for everlasting darkness and despair. Even when men grow rich and great in a course of ungodliness, besides the secret curse of God, which eats out all the comfort of their prosperity, and often diminishes their ill-gotten wealth, their affluence and grandeur expose them to the envy, enmity, and rapacity of their less successful rivals, to whose rebuke the poor are strangers: and should they be able to ransom their lives by their wealth, they cannot in the same way bribe the great Judge of the world, or redeem their souls from hell. The pride also and ambition of ungodly men commonly involve them in quarrels destructive of their comfort and that of their families. From this source, not only domestic discords, and fierce contentions between the nearest relations, arise, but ruinous lawsuits, fatal duels, and perpetuated implacable resentments. Whereas, true religion teaches us to be humble, harmless, meek, patient, and forgiving; to conquer our own spirits by looking to the example of the bleeding Saviour, and to overcome our enemies by persevering kindness. Thus "only by pride cometh contention; but with the well advised," who are taught by the word of God, "is wisdom:" and every Christian finds, that he enjoys peace and happiness, in exact proportion as he exercises meekness, forbearance, and love. It is indeed allowed, that our gracious God, for wise and holy purposes, defers the hope of those who seek his holy consolations; and often pains their hearts, while he proves their sincerity, abates their self-confidence, and excites their earnest exertions: but when the desired peace and joy are given, (and there will be no useless delay,) it will prove a tree of life, and satisfy their souls with inexpressible delight. And if the earnest be so sweet, what will the incorruptible inheritance itself be? But while we wait for this blessedness, let us recollect the painful feelings of such as wait for good, and experience delays and disappointments; and never prolong the uneasiness of those who expect relief from us, when we can with propriety at once fill their hearts with gladness.

V. 13—25.

Again and again, because of our unteachableness, we are reminded, that "poverty and shame shall be to him that despiseth instruction;" and that "whoever despiseth the word of God shall be destroyed: while he that regardeth reproof, and feareth the commandment, shall be honoured and rewarded." And indeed, every reflecting man's observation or experience must confirm the truth of these maxims; and make it evident, that "the law of the wise is a fountain of life to depart from the snares of death." "A good understanding," especially that which the intelligent Christian possesses, conciliates respect and favour, and introduces a man to many advantages, and opportunities of usefulness: whereas irreligion generally makes way for those vices which embitter this present life, and render the thoughts of another most dreadful. Again, prudent men, observing the counsels of the Bible, conduct their affairs with caution, and deal with knowledge in forming and executing their plans: but they who foolishly reject the instructions of the sacred oracles, though considered by themselves or their admirers as politic and sagacious men, often venture on perilous undertakings, engage in ruinous contests, and lay open their folly to the view of all men. It should also be considered, that nothing inspires such fortitude and perseverance in the pursuit of objects worthy of our desires, as faith in the truths and promises of Scripture; nothing so strengthens the soul for exertion and self-denial; nothing so animates a man to lay aside every weight, that he may run with patience the race set before him. The zealous Christian therefore will most enjoy the pleasure of having his desires accomplished: while those to whom "it is an abomination to depart from evil," will find, that their ineffectual wishes, temporary convictions, and feeble endeavours, serve only to increase the bitterness of their final disappointment. They who sustain the character of ministers, are especially concerned in these important words; "A wicked messenger falleth into mischief; but a faithful ambassador is health." They whose ignorance, (the effect of negligence,) whose vices, sloth, or unfaithfulness, have prejudiced, deceived, and ruined the souls of others, will themselves be most miserable: but the vigilant and skilful, the exemplary and faithful servant of God, while he is the messenger of salvation to others, will himself soon hear the gracious words, "Well done good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." In every way "evil pursueth sinners:" the very persons with whom they associate, on whom they lavish their favours, and who pretend to be their friends, help forward their destruction: their temporal concerns are often neglected, for want of judgment; their spiritual always; and the wealth, of which some are possessed, is laid up for the righteous and their posterity. How wonderful then is it, that if the young and inexperienced overlook these truths, the aged, the fathers of families, should so little regard them, either in their own behalf or that of their children? And should so mistake in their expressions of affection to those whom they tenderly love, as if a part of themselves! Yet it may be asserted, without fear of refutation, that the errors of parents in educating their children are entirely as pernicious as the rashness and self-indulgence of young persons. Perhaps the modern improvement of sparing the rod and spoiling the child; and of teaching children various kinds of knowledge, without habituating them to submit to superiors, to apply at stated times to things useful, and to exercise self-denial, has not only made way for much profligacy, but has also introduced a system of insubordination which has shaken Europe to its very centre. Obedience to the authority of parents, even in infancy, is the best preparation for subjection to every ordinance of man in future life: nay, it is a grand mean of bringing young persons to submit to God, as inuring them to the idea, that self-will must be subdued. And when destructive and irrational fondness prevent parents from thus subduing the rebellious spirits of their children, the event will generally prove that their worst enemies could not have done them a greater injury. It should, however, be observed, that correction is properly the province of parents: and that important and delicate trust can seldom be safely delegated, at least it should be done with great caution. For when this exercise of authority is separated from tender affection, it often becomes a species of tyranny, productive of most pernicious consequences. How dire then the effect, when the parent himself, not knowing how to govern his passions, sets his child an evidently bad example, even when correcting him for his faults! In general no man can well govern others, who cannot govern himself: and it too often happens, that chastisement, having been neglected in early years, and afterwards attempted with violence and severity, drives young persons for refuge among bad companions, renders the company of the parent terrible, or at least unpleasant, and lays way for a ruinous alienation in future life. Happy then are those young persons, whom early and judicious correction, good instruction, with kind and wise regard to their time of life, have taught to consider their parents as their best friends and counsellors, and their most pleasant companions, nay, their most faithful confidants! In this way they will readily be led to "walk with wise men," and so learn wisdom. They will also be inured to application, and form habits of industry, which even in the lowest condition seldom fail of securing a comfortable support with a good conscience, and a satisfied mind, which wealth cannot purchase. Nor let it be thought superfluous to remark, that "the tillage of the poor" is preferable to many of those more lucrative employments, which are little useful to society, and too often subserve its vices and follies.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIV. V. 1. A prudent woman, by her proper management of domestic concerns, exceedingly promotes the durable advantage and credit of the family to which she belongs; and even raises it from obscurity and embarrassments to permanent credit and prosperity. But an indiscreet woman, who wastes time, and squanders away money, in vain ornaments, trifling visits, and expensive pleasures, often proves the ruin of her family; even though it hath been in a thriving condition, and though her husband be frugal and industrious: for she acts as if she would pull down the house with her own hands. This coincides with a common observation, that "a fortune in a wife, is better than a fortune with a wife."

V. 2. "The tree must be known by its fruits:" and a man's conduct, as it is either conscientious and upright, or perverse and disobedient, shows whether he reverences or despises God. The last clause may denote, that men of loose characters despise the piety and holiness of such as fear God and walk in his ways; "thinking it strange that

V. 3. The profane, insolent, and abusive language which foolish men utter, springs from excessive pride: and whilst they smite others with it as a rod or staff, they prepare severe corrections for themselves. Whereas the prudent and conciliating words of wise men preserve them from contentions, and extricate them out of difficulties.

V. 4. ‘If the fields lie fallow and be neglected, a ^f mine must needs follow, but good husbandry bestowed on ^f them makes great plenty.’ (Bp. Patrick.) There is no profit without labour and inconvenience: and he that would have the crop of corn, must take the trouble of tending the oxen, and cleansing the stall; which the indolent or over delicate care not to do.

V. 5. (Notes, xii. 17—19. xiii. 5.)

V. 6. A scorner is one, who treats divine things with profane contempt. He thinks his own understanding equal to the investigation, and even comprehension, of every subject: he therefore rejects as false what he cannot account for, and finds contrary to his preconceived sentiments or vain reasonings; and indeed all, that tends to condemn his conduct or expose his folly. In this presumptuous frame he may seek for wisdom, even in the Scriptures, without success. The state of his heart disposes him to despise the sacred mysteries, the humbling doctrines, and the holy precepts of revelation: he will therefore, by criticisms and bold conjectures, alter the text, or explain away its meaning. Or disgusted by finding that those doctrines which he dislikes are certainly contained in the Bible, he will at length take shelter in infidelity. These are indeed modern ways in which “scorners seek wisdom and find it not;” but doubtless the scorners of former days had methods equally successful of evading conviction, and closing their eyes against the light of truth. ‘He that comes to seek ^h after knowledge with a mind to scorn and censure, shall ^h be sure to find enough for his humour, but none for his ^h instruction.’ (Lord Bacon.) ‘This humour of deriding ^h springs from a great pride and conceit of their own wit, ^h which disposes them to seek wisdom, not from others, but ^h wholly from themselves; and so they are not likely to ^h find it, where it is not to be had.’ ‘Some who having ^h laughed at religion all their days, at least desire to under ^h stand it; but cannot, through their own inveterate indispo ^h sition to it.’ (Bp. Patrick.) ‘They seek it, as Simon Ma ^h gus, for their own ambition, not for God’s glory.’

‘Hear the first law, the judgment of the skies

‘He that hates truth shall be the dupe of lies.’—(Comper.)

But he, who is humbly conscious of his ignorance and unworthiness, will search the Scriptures in a teachable spirit, and with seriousness, reverence, and prayer: thus the Author of wisdom will deliver him from prejudice, preserve him from error and uncertainty, and show him his truth and will. And with this state of the heart, the understanding is as well suited to receive the instructions of God’s word, as sound and strong eyes are to receive the light of the sun: so that knowledge becomes easy to those who are of an understanding heart.

V. 7. ‘It is best to flee the company of such persons, whose discourse thou perceivest tends to nothing but ^o vice and mischief.’ (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 8. The prudent man does not value that wisdom, which consists in abstruse speculations or profound policy: but that which teaches him the paths of safety and of duty: and directs him to escape the dangers, avail himself of the advantages, and surmount the difficulties, of his situation in life, that he may proceed with increasing satisfaction, credit, and usefulness. But that which ungodly men call wisdom, is indeed folly; it is mere craft and imposition, which at length deceives them, and they are taken in their own net. ‘New stratagems must be devised, the old failing ^h and growing useless; and as soon as ever a man has ^h got the name of a cunning crafty companion, he hath ^h deprived himself utterly of the principal instrument for ^h the management of his affairs, which is trust.’—(Lord Bacon.)

V. 9. Foolish and profane men consider sin as a mere trifle, rather a laughing matter than a dreadful and hateful evil. They divert themselves with tempting others to sin: they commit iniquity without scruple, in pursuit of pleasure or gain; and they in a jesting manner talk over their knavish or licentious practices, and recount how many they have over-reached, debauched, or surpassed in profaneness or intemperance. The word translated mock at signifies also palliate, or excuse. ‘There may be this sense in the ^h words, Fools endeavour to make handsome apologies for ^h their faults, and to find out colourable excuses for them. ^h—Or fools laugh and jeer at those who have committed a ^h sin, but good men pity them, and by kind reproofs seek ^h their amendment.’ Or ‘when fools offend God, they ^h make nothing of it: but if good men in the least offend, ^h they presently beg his pardon, and seek his grace and ^h favour. The former part of the sentence may also be ^h inverted. Sin will expose those to scorn, who are so ^h foolish as to commit it. A good admonition to those who ^h make a mock at sin, which will in time make a mock of ^h them, and expose them as ridiculous fools.’ (Bp. Patrick.) Indeed these are no more than illustrations of the general exposition before given.

V. 10. No man is competent to judge of the inward anguish or pleasure of others, who are often more happy or miserable than they appear to be. None can tell what stings of conscience or corroding passions torment the prosperous sinner, whilst he appears gay, and indulges in mirth. Nor can ungodly men know what satisfaction a serious Christian enjoys, at a distance from scenes of vain merriment; or even in poverty, sickness, or at the hour of death. 'We should not censure too heavily the passions of grief or of joy in others: because the causes of them may be unknown to us.' (Bp. Patrick.) 'As a man's conscience is witness of his own grief, so another cannot feel the joy and comfort which a man feelth in himself.'

V. 11. The contrast between the house, or grand mansion of the wicked, and the tabernacle, or mean tent, of the righteous, is especially to be noted.

V. 12. Open iniquity and impiety must seem wrong to every reflecting person. But there is another way, which joins those ways of death at last, yet at present seems right to a man. Formality, superstition, self-righteousness, enthusiasm, and in short, all that is called religion, but is unscriptural, must certainly be intended. 'Shadows too often cheat us of the reality; against which there is no remedy.' (Bp. Patrick.) This idea of a man confidently thinking himself right, till, on ending his journey, he finds he had all along been in the road to hell, is tremendous beyond the power of expression or even conception.

V. 13. That show of happiness which attends laughter and noisy mirth, is a mere imposition. In the midst of such turbulent scenes the heart is often oppressed with sorrow; and when they are over, the mind becomes more gloomy than ever. Especially when these are used as expedients to banish reflection, or quiet convictions, as they frequently are. Such ways of driving away care bring numbers to bankruptcy, and even suicide, and hurry still greater numbers into everlasting misery.

V. 14. He that forsaketh God shall be punished, and made weary of his sins, wherein he delighted. "The backslider in heart" once appeared religious, but after a while, through persecution or temptation, he deliberately renounces his profession, and shows that the world always had his heart and supreme affections. liarily hopeless, and he will be filled with his own devices. This was Judas' case: he acted according to the habitual state of his heart, in betraying his Lord. But Peter, when, overcome by a sudden temptation, he betrayed Christ, behaved inconsistently with his real character: his heart was not apostate: he repented and was pardoned. The latter clause may, more literally, be rendered, "the good man will depart from his paths." "He that is begotten of God keepeth himself, and that wicked one toucheth him not." (1 John v. 18.) According to our translation it may be thus explained. He whose delight is in doing good, will have a spring of satisfaction in his own soul, which will preserve him from returning to the world, through desire of its friendship, or dread of its power.

V. 15. Heedless and unstable men are easily imposed on, not only as to their worldly concerns, but also in religion. Confidence, insinuation, flattery, and plausible eloquence, easily entangle them in error and delusion. They are at best "children tossed to and fro by every wind of doctrine, by the sleight of men, &c." And "Satan transformed into an angel of light," fatally deceives numbers of them. But "the prudent man looks well to his going," and the word of God teaches us more caution; and warns us to "beware lest any man deceive us:" and he who attends to it will shun the snares of Satan and his servants.

V. 16. A wise man fears God and hates sin, and thus he avoids the occasions and appearances of evil; and is thankful for cautions and directions. But the foolish are self-confident and regardless of consequences: they are vehement in their courses and enraged at those who would give them warning or advice. Thus they rush forward to the brink of the precipice, and at length fall headlong into destruction.

V. 17. He that is hasty in resentment very foolishly exposes himself to manifold troubles, and often does much mischief, and is both pitied and blamed: yet he, who conceals his hatred, and devises how to take deliberate revenge, is a far more odious and dangerous character.

V. 18. Careless sinners seem to claim ignorance as their patrimony, and to consider it as their privilege to act without reflection; and thus folly, with all its consequences, will be their final portion. But the prudent consider useful

V. 19. It often happens, in the course of providence, that wicked men are reduced to the necessity of making submission to the righteous, and are brought to crave their assistance and prayers. Thus the Egyptians waited on Joseph, and Pharaoh called for Moses: and this is a pledge of their final prevalence and pre-eminency. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 20. This is an illustration of the selfishness and dissimulation of mankind. It is evident, in fact, that when a man is impoverished, his former friends and acquaintance grow shy of him, and treat him with neglect and unkindness: but when a man grows rich, he has friends in abundance, who pretend great esteem and respect for him.

V. 21. 'But let such men know, that it is a greater sin than they imagine, and shall be severely punished, to overlook their poor neighbour, and deny him their charitable relief.' (Bp. Patrick.) The wicked man is rather an object of pity than of contempt: but to despise men, on account of their low circumstances or mean employment, is peculiarly foolish, and is ungrateful to God, who alone has made the difference. The latter clause is peculiarly emphatical, "Oh the felicities of him that sheweth favour to the poor, or modest!" He shall be happy beyond expression.

V. 22. Are they not fatally deceived who expect to prosper by craftily devising mischief? 'But they who take pains to study how to do men good, shall never fail of that bountiful reward, which is secured to them by the faithful promise of God.' (Bp. Patrick.) They who trust in the mercy and faithfulness of God, will be followers or imitators of him, in their conduct towards men. They devise good, and experience abundantly the truth and goodness of God.

V. 23. 'Solomon here separates the fruit of the labour of the tongue, and of the labour of the hands; as if want was the revenue of the one, and wealth the revenue of the other. For it commonly comes to pass, that they who talk liberally, boast much, and promise mighty things, are beggars.' (Lord Bacon.)

V. 24. When men of wisdom and piety possess riches, they do so much good with them, that they are as a crown to them, enhancing their reputation and enlarging their sphere of usefulness. But foolish and wicked men act in character in all situations, and riches only render their folly more egregiously and emphatically foolishness.

V. 25. Deceitful, &c. "Deceit poureth out lies."—If a man be influenced by deceit, he is very ingenious in inventing, and ready in propagating lies, without regarding the mischief arising from them: but a faithful witness often preserves the lives of such as were in danger of perishing by false accusation. The maxim is still more important, when interpreted of the faithful minister, and the teacher of lies; and the consequences of their conduct, in the salvation or ruin of immortal souls.

V. 26, 27. 'They who fear the Lord, have a strong ground of confidence in his promises, and will generally be preserved from distressing fears in life and death. Indeed they are his children, and have a refuge in their Father's love, power, and truth, to which they may always resort. So that their faith and piety prove a fountain of life, to depart from the snares of death.' Some interpret the clause "his children have a place of refuge," as referring to the believer's posterity. 'His children after him may flee to God for safety, and hope to fare the better for their pious father's sake.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 28. 'The honour and splendour of a king depends on 'the multitude of his subjects; whom therefore he ought 'to cherish: for if they be wasted by unnecessary wars,
'or forced into other countries by oppression and unjust
'exactions, it proves the ruin of his kingdom.' (Bp. Patrick.) Various other ways of discouraging population, and destroying or driving away industrious subjects, might be mentioned, and illustrated by examples, from the times of Pharaoh, to this present day. (Ex. i.) The crusades, especially against the Albigenses, &c. the persecutions of the infamous Duke of Alva in the low countries; the revocation of the edict of Nantz, by Lewis XIV; the expulsion of the Moors from Spain; the Inquisition; and finally the cruel treatment of slaves in the West Indies, which renders the detestable slave-trade in some sense necessary to prevent depopulation, are a few instances of that ruinous policy which is here reprobated.

30 A ¹ sound heart is the life of the flesh: but ¹ envy the rottenness of the bones.

31 He ⁿ that oppresseth the poor reproacheth his Maker: ^o but he that honoureth him hath mercy on the poor.

32 The wicked is ^p driven away in his wickedness: but ^q the righteous hath hope in his death.

V. 29. Exalteth, &c. The passionate man exalteth folly to the throne, and willingly executes her senseless commands.

V. 30. An upright, contented, and benevolent mind conduces to health and long life; whereas envy and other malignant passions, prey upon the spirits and ruin the constitution, like some incurable disease.

V. 31. The oppression of the needy seems to reproach the Creator, as if he had formed the poor of another species; or had cast them down on purpose that they should be trampled on. The oppressor reproacheth the Lord, by despising or defying his engagement to avenge the cause of the poor and oppressed. Nay, he does his best to bring reproach on the providential government of God, in that he hath put so much into the power of such vile wretches, and connives so long at their crimes. But every one that honours God, will for his sake treat the poor with compassion, and endeavour to alleviate their distresses, not to add to them.

V. 32. The wicked, (at death, for that is evidently spoken of,) is not only cast away for his crimes, but driven out of the world by irresistible force, with all his unrepented guilt on his soul, and under the power of all his domineering evil propensities and long continued bad habits; the slave of pride, avarice, malice, envy, and other hateful passions; “a vessel of wrath fitted for destruction:” but the righteous hath hope in his death, his sins being pardoned, and his heart renewed; and while he gives thanks for being made meet for the inheritance of the saints in light, he trusts in the promises of God, that he shall speedily join them, and at length be reunited to those whom he most loved here on earth. What can this proverb mean, worthy to be compared with this obvious interpretation, if we do not take in the belief and expectation of the eternal world?

V. 33. Wisdom possesses the heart, and regulates the affections and tempers, of him that hath understanding; and it is not spent in ostentatious displays. But it soon appears how the head and heart of a fool are furnished: for he continually betrays his ignorance and wickedness, by all his words and actions, as if ambitious of being known in his true character.

V. 34. Righteousness powerfully tends to promote public peace and prosperity, and to give an ascendancy to that nation in which it generally prevails. Genuine piety, is inseparably connected with industry, sobriety, equity, and mercy, and also with frugality; and these conduce to health, population, union, and competency. Moreover they ensure the divine blessing to the community, which must needs exalt any nation. But every kind of sin has the contrary tendency: the prevalency of vice and impiety is a national reproach; conduces to disunion, weakness, and disgrace; and exposes any people to the wrath and vengeance of God. The word translated reproach, is the same which is commonly rendered mercy or goodness; and this has given rise to other interpretations of the latter clause; as if it meant that mercy was as a sin-offering for any people, where it prevailed: and the margin of the old translation renders it, “but the mercy of the people is the sacrifice for sin.” Others think it relates to the Gentiles (the word people being plural;) and they render it “The goodness of the nations is sin;” meaning that the religion and virtues of idolaters, instead of righteousness, are sinful in the sight of God. This interpretation is, doubtless, more scriptural than the preceding: but as the word in question does in one place evidently mean reproach or atrocious wickedness; (a wicked thing, Lev. xx. 17:) and as a verb from the same root has clearly a similar meaning even in this book, (xxv. 10;) so there appears no sufficient reason for altering our translation, and departing from the interpretation above given. The word indeed, (like some others in different languages, (Notes, Job i. 5. ii. 9.) seems to mean what is uncommon, either of goodness or of baseness; but more generally it is used in the former sense.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16.

The more the religion of the Scripture is examined, the fuller must be the conviction of every impartial judge, that it is of divine original; because in all things it is conducive, in proportion as received and practised, to the welfare of individuals, families, and nations. This appears conclusively, when we consider that the character and conduct which scriptural principles are suited to form, would be far more eligible, in any relation, than the opposite character, even to those who are prejudiced against the principles themselves. For who would not prefer, on sober reflection, as a wife, that prudent woman who, making the word of God her rule, takes pleasure in the concerns of the household, the care of her children, and the credit and comfort of her husband; to one of those foolish women, whose negligence and extravagance are the ruin of so many families, and the calamity of all related to them? Who can doubt whether the former character be not incomparably more valuable as a parent also, and as a member of the community? Nay, posterity are greatly concerned in this remark; for prudent women are not only the stay of families, but a blessing to the rising generation, and the support of declining empires ; while the foolish entail poverty, shame, and ignorance on their descendants ; and bequeath as a legacy to the community, a vicious and worthless progeny. Wherever the fear of God is the ruling principle, a man will walk in his integrity : but they who despise Him and his servants, cannot reasonably be expected to be conscientious in their general behaviour. In the mouth of such men is 'a rod of pride,' which renders them mischievous, and exposes them to immense vexation ; from which "the lips of the wise preserve them." In numerous instances, they who fear not God, declining the self-denial and fatigue of labour in any mean employment, and affecting gentility and delicacy, become the burdens and nuisances of society, which in one way or other is pillaged for their support. But humility, submission to the will of God, and the desire of living at a distance from temptation and without injuring any one, render the pious man ready for any honest employment, and for such inconveniences as necessarily attach to it. These, therefore, form the most valuable and most comfortable part of the community : for indeed "where no oxen are, the crib is clean ; but much increase is by the strength of the ox : " and the public is as much advantaged as the husbandman himself. While the irreligious, to answer their wicked purposes, are induced to multiply lies and even perjuries ; and while they excuse their crimes, and make a mock at sin, the pious man strictly adheres to truth and equity, and exercises himself to have a "conscience void of offence towards God and man : " for the divine favour is his choice and object, which is with the righteous alone. The way of peace and holiness lie open before him, because he seeks wisdom seriously and humbly from the Scriptures, and with earnest prayer that he may glorify God and do good : but the pride, levity, and profaneness of the scorner, render him incapable of distinguishing truth from falsehood, right from wrong ; and his very genius and learning only make him more extensively mischievous, by propagating infidelity, heresy, or impiety, in a specious and imposing manner. Here again the "wisdom of the prudent, which is to understand his way," appears invaluable. He, "who fears God and walks in his ways, will go from the presence of the foolish man, when he perceives not in him the lips of knowledge." Wit, ingenuity, politeness, or eloquence make no amends, in his judgment, for the want of seriousness, for erroneous and pernicious opinions, or scoffing and jesting at things sacred. Thus he will be kept from the fatal contagion of profane company, and that worst deceit and folly even of fools, namely, excusing vice by principles subversive of all justice and truth, as well as piety and religion. As "there is a way which seemeth right unto a man ; yet the end thereof are the ways of death ; " "the wise man feareth and departeth from evil ; " he not only shuns the profane scoffer ; but the soothing or ostentatious deceiver. While "the simple believeth every word," he prudently "looks well to his going ; " for eternal happiness or misery are at stake. While "the fool rageth and is confident ; " he fears lest he should be deceived, and humbly seeks to God, praying to be kept from every delusion. When he sees men, who have appeared to be religious, turn back into the ways of sin ; he mourns over them, foreseeing the awful consequences ; and becomes more jealous of himself and watchful over his own heart : and knows, that in general, they that forsake God, do it, "loving this present world ; " he becomes more and more afraid of covetousness, and often seems to hear the Saviour caution him, as he did the disciples of old, "Remember Lot's wife ! " and remember that "the house of the wicked shall be overthrown ; but the tabernacle of the upright shall flourish." It is indeed of the greatest importance to possess a source of consolation, independent of all outward things : and this is the peculiar advantage of the pious man, and the means of preserving him from temptation. External appearances are very inadequate evidences of a man's happiness or misery. Even in the midst of prosperity and laughter sinners are conscious that they are not happy. They often strive to repress their sighs, to silence their consciences, and to quiet their fears : but they will find their sensual mirth end at length in weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth. And as none but themselves know the bitterness of their hearts in their hours of solitude ; so none, but the true believer, can understand the nature of that serious joy, which is possessed in communion with God, and in the hope and first-fruits of heaven : with this no stranger can intermeddle, this no event can destroy, or long suspend ; and this causes the Christian to cease from envying the prosperous sinner : it mars his relish for worldly pleasure, and turns the balance of happiness vastly in his favour, even amidst the trials of life. Let then the sons of vanity and sensuality possess their inheritance of folly, unenvied, but not unpitied ; and let every believer rejoice with gratitude, and say, "The lines are fallen to me in pleasant places, yea, I have a goodly heritage."

V. 17—35.

These verses only give us another view of the advantages, which true religion confers on the possessor, and on others by his means. Whilst the passionate man exalteth folly, and rashly plungeth himself into discord and mischief, by which he becomes wretched and contemptible, whilst the malicious is hated for his sullen devices of revenge ; and whilst the envious torments himself because of the success of his competitors : the Christian is instructed to exercise meekness and forgiveness, to be contented and benevolent, and to take pleasure in witnessing and aiding the success and comfort of all around him. He sheweth his superiority of understanding by being slow to anger : and increasing knowledge crowns him with true honour. For wisdom resides in the heart, to direct a man's judgment, and moderate his desires ; and thus without ostentation it appears in his life and actions : whilst fools continually expose themselves by their vain boastings, as well as by their ill behaviour. But, in all cases a sound heart and well governed passions, are life and comfort; while every domineering sinful temper is as rottenness in the bones.— Again, view that part of ungodly men, who seek affluence as their chief good; and expect happiness in worshipping Mammon. How do these men oppress the poor by merciless exactions, by defrauding them of their wages, and by numberless methods of injustice and cruelty! But, while they thus reproach and despise the common Creator of rich and poor, and of the whole human race; and glory, as it were, in their ingratitude to their Benefactor: do they not also become most worthless and pernicious members of society? and are they not, by corroding suspicions, harassing fears, and turbulent passions, wretched amidst their immense possessions, and multiplied indulgences? “The wicked is like the troubled sea, whose waters cast forth mire and dirt. There is no peace, saith my God, for the wicked.” Now contemplate the opposite character. He who honours God has mercy on the poor: he dares not, nay, he is not inclined to, despise the mean appearance, or uncouth behaviour, of his neighbour, in whatever clime he was born, or of whatever complexion; but, as he would be happy himself, so he would endeavour to promote the happiness of others; and he finds it an accession to his own comfort to relieve their distresses. He feels his need of the mercy and truth of God, in order to the salvation of his soul: and he copies them in devising to do good to the afflicted who expect it from him. Thus he best consults his own good, “for do they not err, who devise evil” when in the “fear of the Lord is strong confidence,” and none but his children can have a refuge in the approaching hour of death, and day of judgment? Let us then now seek to this Fountain of life, that we may escape the snares of death, and be safe and confident, when the wicked are sinking in consternation and despair. It is no less evident that righteousness is the grand support of nations: and that sin cuts the sinews and undermines the foundations of every community in which it prevails. And though the long-suffering of God hath hitherto spared this nation for the sake of a small remnant, which he hath reserved to himself: yet as sin is become the reproach, so it will be the ruin of our favoured land, except a general reformation take place; for it will at length be found to be universally true that “the evil bow before the good, and the wicked at the gates of the righteous.” The wise and pious are therefore the best patriots: by their examples, prayers, labours, and influence, they endeavour to stem the torrent of infidelity, profaneness, profligacy, and iniquity, and to promote that righteousness, which alone establisheth prosperity. Wisdom and piety form also the grand qualifications of good princes. Such will not waste the lives, or drain off the riches of their subjects by needless wars, to gratify their own ambition, rapacity, or revenge: they will not destroy or drive away the people by oppression, persecution, or bloody executions, or exorbitant taxes: nay, they will study to preserve peace, plenty, and good order, and the impartial administration of justice, and to encourage industry and ingenuity. This will induce strangers to come and settle in the land, and

“in the multitude of the people is the king’s honour; but in the want of people is the destruction of the prince.” At the same time they will, by their example and influence, and every scriptural means, endeavour to promote the spread of vital godliness. As “their favour will be shown to the wise and righteous, and their wrath will be against those that cause shame;” they will be rid of corrupt ministers as soon as they detect them; and will employ those who heartily concur in their wise, equitable, and pious measures: and happy will that people be, who are in such a case. But as genuine religion is in every thing most excellent: so we are required to be peculiarly upon our guard against counterfeits: for prejudice, ignorance, and fashion even canonize false schemes of religion. Here then we should learn to distinguish betwixt the faithful witness who will not lie, and who delivereth souls; and those deceitful witnesses who speak lies, either through ignorance or hypocrisy, for filthy lucre’s sake, and to the destruction of their hearers. If we carefully compare their lives and doctrine with the word of God, we shall soon learn to know one from the other. And this distinction is far more important with respect to those witnesses who speak from the pulpit, than those who bear their testimony in courts of justice; and the false witnesses are, alas! in the former case, far more numerous in proportion. The importance of this remark will appear most evident when the wicked is driven by death from all their possessions and enjoyments, under the wrath of God, and the power of their lusts, into the eternal world; and when the righteous shall rejoice in hope of a blessed immortality, without sin or sorrow, in the presence of his Lord: and this will reconcile him to the separating stroke, and smooth the countenance of the king of terrors. Let us also endeavour to be always well employed: “for in all labour there is profit;” but in every thing the mere talk of the lips tendeth only to penury: and let those to whom the Lord hath given riches, endeavour to show their wisdom by making a good use of them: for thus they will be a crown to them; otherwise they will only enable them to be more conspicuously and perniciously foolish. ’Tis true, that at present many will profess to esteem and respect them, merely because they are rich: and the poor, however wise and pious, will be despised and hated, because he is poor. But ere long, Lazarus will be honoured, as well as comforted, and Dives despised as well as tormented. For “the favour of our King will” uniformly “be toward the wise servant; but his wrath will be against him that causeth shame.”

‘return worse to those which are given them; endeavouring to overcome by sharpness and bitterness, not by lenity and moderation.’ (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 2. Wise men know how to communicate knowledge, as circumstances require, in the most acceptable and useful manner: but even the learning and right notions which wicked men obtain, as well as their errors and follies, are poured out so indiscriminately, that they do more harm than good. It is indeed evident, that many have good capacities and considerable knowledge, who totally want judgment and discretion for improving them.

V. 3. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4. “The healing of the tongue is a tree of life.” When a man is able and willing to speak for the instruction of the ignorant, the encouragement of the troubled conscience or afflicted heart, the calming of the spirits of those who are enraged, and the healing of differences among neighbours, his tongue is as a tree of life; it will, as it were, create a paradise around him, and exceedingly promote the comfort, peace, and salvation of mankind. But proud, passionate, scurrilous, and exasperating language, makes breaches upon a man's spirit; it throws him off his guard, distresses his mind, misleads his judgment, excites his anger, and brings guilt on his conscience. The same word signifies both spirit and wind. ‘Perverseness,’ in the tongue, ‘is like a blustering wind among the boughs of the trees; rending and tearing the life and spirit of a man's self and others.’ (Bp. Hall.)

V. 5. (Note, xiii. 1.) ‘He that profits by instruction and correction, when a child, is likely to become a prudent man.’

V. 6. A moderate provision, a contented mind, and confidence in God, are an inestimable treasure in the house of the righteous, both for the good of them, and of their children after them. But the large revenues of wicked men increase their fears and suspicions; add strength to their passions, augment their pride and impatience of contradiction, expose them to envy and enmity, engage them in discords, tempt them to inordinate and injurious indulgence, bring guilt upon their consciences, and render the fears of death and judgment doubly distressing.

V. 7. Knowledge, like wealth, is valuable in proportion as it is communicated with prudence and propriety.

To acquire useful knowledge, therefore, is a great object to a wise man, who would glorify God and do good; but to find out, and embrace opportunities of communicating it, in the most extensive measure, and in such ways as render the imparted instruction permanent in its effects, is the grand improvement of the talent, when acquired, and of the influence it gives. Thus the apostles scattered the knowledge of Christ by preaching and writing, through the nations; and the fruit remains to this day. But men of knowledge, who do not impart instruction, are misers among the learned, in the world and in the church: and ignorant men have nothing worth communicating, so that they are beggarly, lazy spendthrifts.

V. 8, 9. The most costly sacrifices of the wicked, under the Mosaic law, must have been an abomination to the Lord; because their whole way was abominable to him, and because of their corrupt motives: and the case is precisely the same, with all external acts of worship, nay, with the largest oblations and most liberal alms, of the impenitent and unbelieving, under the Christian dispensation. For, by them, they either mean nothing determinate, or they intend to cover their sins, to bribe their Judge, to make compensation for past, or to purchase indulgences for future transgressions; they put their services in the stead either of Christ's atonement, or of holy obedience; they present them with hypocritical hearts; and they grossly affront the holy God, by supposing that he can be imposed on by forms or gifts, or pleased by them whilst they are enemies to his justice, his authority, and his grace. But will the greatest of sinners, if he desires to repent, or seek salvation, be rejected? By no means: when this desire brings the poor murderer, or thief, to cry for mercy in the Redeemer's name, he begins to offer “the prayer of the upright, in which God delighteth:” and may be sure of acceptance, in proportion as he is ashamed on account of former crimes and present unworthiness; and as in brokenness of heart he dares not lift up his eyes unto heaven, but at a humble distance, smites upon his breast, crying, “God be merciful to me, a sinner.” Such intimations, under the law, were a kind of prophecy, that another and more spiritual dispensation was at hand.

V. 11. Abaddon, the word here rendered destruction, sometimes means the devil, the destroyer: and the verse may denote, that the deepest machinations of the prince of hell, and of all his legions of fallen angels, are open to the Lord’s inspection, and must end in their disappointment and deeper torment: how then can man, who is so inferior in sagacity and subtlety, expect to hide his counsels from God, or to prosper in rebellion against him? Such foolish persons are found in every age, of every rank, and among the learned as well as the unlearned. As the ignorant can feed upon transubstantiation, purgatory, and indulgences, or the wildest absurdities of enthusiasm: so learned men can relish the more refined, but not less absurd, speculations of skeptics and infidels; till professing themselves wise, they become fools, doubt of every thing, or even deny the existence of the God that made them. bers, not only pour out such foolishness, but greedily devour it, as if it were the most delicious and wholesome food of the soul!

V. 15. Affliction, or poverty, without a cheerful spirit, renders a man’s life wretched; but with it much habitual satisfaction may be enjoyed, even in very unfavourable circumstances. ‘A mind conscious of good intentions, though success be wanting, affords truer and purer joy, than all that the world can furnish a man withal.’ (Lord Bacon.)—The original is good of heart, and seems to denote that inward peace, which springs from the testimony of conscience, and submissive confidence in God. Some render the clause, “The good of heart, are a continual feast:” Their company is peculiarly pleasant and desirable.

V. 16. (Notes, Ps. xxxvii. 16.)

V. 17, 18. ‘The meanest fare with the love of him who invites, and with agreement among the guests, is much better than the most sumptuous entertainments of him that hates us, or among those that quarrel.—A man prone to wrath will easily disturb the most peaceable companies: but a meek and patient person is so far from raising strife, that he will endeavour to compose it, where he finds it begun by others.’ (Bp. Patrick.) Thus some connexion has been supposed between these two maxims: but each of them is capable of a much more extensive application; in respect of the true enjoyment of life, and the peace of families, neighbourhoods, churches, and nations. “If there be any comfort of love.” “Blessed are the peace-makers.” “For the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God.” (Note 1.)

V. 19. Whatever a sluggard has to do, seems full of intolerable difficulties: like a man’s forcing his way repeatedly through a hedge of thorns: and indeed his delays tend to increase his perplexities, and expose him to many sufferings, which a prudent and upright attention to every duty in its proper season would have prevented: “But the way of the righteous is cast up, or paved,” so that he proceeds with ease and safety.

spirit, or superior understanding; and even to turn them into ridicule among his gay companions: but this maxim may show such youths what their true character is in the sight of God, and in that of all wise men.

V. 21. (Note, x. 23.)

V. 22. (Note, xi. 14.) Where no secret consultation is held on the means of accomplishing important purposes, or where secrecy is not observed by those concerned, disappointment may be expected: but among a number of faithful counsellors the best measures for establishing the design, and of securing success, will be suggested.

V. 23. When a wise and pious man is enabled to speak to the purpose, and to time his observations well, so that they prove evidently words in season, and produce the desired effect, immense good may be done, which many will see and acknowledge; and this will be to him a source of satisfaction and a cause of gratitude. Some connect this with the preceding verse. When prudent and seasonable advice is given by any one, amidst a multitude of counsellors, which the rest had not thought of; so that the success of the measure was owing to it: such a man shall "have joy by the answer of his mouth." No words can express how useful one permanent and seasonable remark may prove. "If we will have our talk comfortable, we must wait for time and season."

V. 24. The way of life is above the reach and conception of sensualists, and of those who despise divine instruction: it is also above the revolutions of this unstable world. Being of heavenly origin, it raises the heart to the love of those things which are above. And the treasure, and the heart being in heaven, wise men depart further and further from the ways that lead to hell beneath. "He that is truly wise, hath his conversation and affections above: and in the holy way of obedience walketh on unto eternal life." (Bp. Hall.)—If life, in this verse, means any thing more than continuance in this world, hell beneath cannot mean the grave, but the place of future misery: otherwise, where is the contrast?

V. 25. The proud and insolent often trample on the poor, whilst they despise God, and scorn submission. But though they build grand houses and get large estates by oppression and wrong, and leave flourishing families, in a little while those will be crushed, and justice done to the orphans and widows whom they have despoiled. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 26. Wicked designs and contrivances, though not accomplished, are abominable to God, and will accordingly be punished: but the pious and benevolent discourse of those who "have purified their souls, in obeying the truth through the Spirit, unto unfeigned love," are acceptable to him; even when little more is in their power, or when their endeavours to do good fail of success.

V. 27. The covetous man will let none of his family have any rest or enjoyment. Greediness of gain often tempts men to embark in projects which entail ruin on their families; to commit perjuries, or to take bribes, which cause perhaps their estates to be confiscated; or to use such iniquitous methods of growing rich, as bring the curse of God on all their possessions, which descend to their heirs with that dreadful encumbrance. But he who hateth bribes, and every dishonest or unseemly gain, shall live in credit and comfort.

V. 28. (Note 23.)

V. 29. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 30. The works of creation and the various objects that we behold, give great pleasure to the mind, and endear to us the light of the sun, and the organs of sight: and good tidings cheer the heart, and conduce to health. How delightful then must it be to the humble sinner, to hear the good report of salvation, and to have the eyes enlightened to behold the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ! Many understand the good report, or hearing, of the pleasure arising from a good character. "Nothing makes a man so cheerful in well-doing, as to hear a fair report of his own honest actions; or to receive the good news of the well doing of other virtuous men." (Bp. Patrick.) But any other really good news may have a similar effect.

V. 33. The grand instruction of heavenly wisdom, is this, ‘Fear God, submit to him, and obey him:’ and humility is the fore-runner and preparation for genuine honour. ‘God exalteth none, but them that are truly humbled.’ (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—18.

What inexhaustible mines of wisdom are contained in the sacred Scriptures ! Every chapter we consider forms a rich vein of this invaluable ore, and our researches serve only to convince us, that we are as yet working merely on the surface ! May the Lord give us a heart to value, and to labour for, and to appropriate these treasures, that we may be of good understanding in “the way of godliness !” As “the wisdom from above is first pure, then peaceable. “gentle and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good “fruits, without partiality and without hypocrisy ;” it always dictates those “soft answers which turn away wrath, and “bridles the tongue from uttering the grievous words that “stir up anger :” even when the sarcastical wit and ingenuity of them are suited to gain the applause of the ill-judging multitude. He that is humble and meek shuns all dispute, whenever he can do it with a clear conscience : He appeases anger, and disarms resentment by every reasonable concession. He uses his influence to calm the passions of others ; to terminate or prevent litigations and controversies ; to promote peace among his neighbours and among his fellow-Christians, as far as truth and holiness will admit of it. Thus he leads, comparatively, a happy life, and is a blessing to others : for “the fruit of righteousness is sown in peace of them that make peace ;” but “where envy and strife are, there is confusion and “every evil work.” Yet, alas ! those wrathful men that stir up the fire of strife, provided they have wit or eloquence, are most admired, not only in the world, but even in the church : and are the great favourites of the several sects and parties, into which it is unhappily divided. In this view, however, how important is the use or abuse of the tongue !—For “A healing tongue is indeed a tree of “life ; but perverseness therein is a breach in the spirit.” Nor can the mischief be conceived, which is continually done, while “the mouth of fools poureth out foolishness, impiety, and profligacy, and every pernicious principle ; and while others, no wiser than they, but not such proficient in the school of profaneness, relish and feed on their foolishness. Yet this unruly member, which is full of deadly poison ; yea, a fire, a world “of iniquity,—“which setteth on fire the whole course of nature, and “is set on fire of hell :” is also one main instrument, which God employs in displaying his own glory and promoting the cause of truth and righteousness on earth ! For “a good man, out of the good treasure of his heart, “bringeth forth good things.” He hath understanding, and he seeks knowledge : “the word of Christ dwells in “him richly, in all wisdom and spiritual understanding ;” and thus he learns to “use knowledge aright.” For it is not enough to speak things that are true and good : but much wisdom is required to adapt our discourse to the occasions which present themselves : that by a due respect to the character, circumstances, and wants of the persons addressed, we may speak to the case decisively, and so as to obviate objections and evasions ; whether our object be to silence gainsayers, to rectify mistakes, to preserve those that are in danger of being deceived, to encourage the desponding, to conciliate those that are entering into contention, or to convince the prejudiced. In this way “the lips “of the wise disperse knowledge :” they learn the instructions of life from each other, and then communicate them in their circles, whether as ministers or private Christians, and thus render many wise unto salvation, who at length become able to teach others also. They who would be qualified for such useful services, and employed in them, must begin by welcoming instruction and even reproof ; and by learning to profit by their own mistakes ; for he who proudly or carelessly refuses instruction, despises his own life and the interests of his immortal soul : but he who with docility, seriousness, and humility, can bear to be reproofed for his faults, and convinced of his errors, will always be getting understanding. In like manner, when any one thankfully and patiently hearkens to the admonitions of the Scriptures, and takes pleasure in faithful instruction ; though he finds himself continually condemned for one part or other of his conduct : when he evidently loves those who reprove him, and prefers the company of wise and pious men, from whom he may learn some salutary lessons : we may confidently expect that he will become a wise and useful man. But when he, who is evidently in the path of ruin, is offended with those that would set him aright : when he imbibes a strong prejudice against every one who rebukes him, and despises even a father’s admonition, when he shuns the company or ministry of those that point out to him his guilt and danger ; there is too great reason to fear that he is a scorner, who hates to be reformed, and is bent on his own destruction : for “correction is grievous to him that forsaketh the way, “and he that hateth reproof shall die.”—Forgetfulness of God is the great source of all the other sins and follies into which men are hurried by their passions ; for did they well consider that “the eyes of the LORD are in every “place, beholding the evil and the good : and that “hell and destruction are before him ; much more the “hearts of the children of men ;” they must be restrained in their evil courses by dread of his almighty indignation. But “God is not in all their thoughts ;” and therefore their ways are an abomination unto him. Would we then be found among those who “follow after righteousness,” and “whom the LORD loveth ;” let these thoughts be habitually in our minds. “Thou God seest me ;” thou seest my most secret desires and motives ; “Thou requiest rest truth in the inward parts.” “The sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to thee, but the prayer of the

Maxims of wisdom, relating to the pro-

"upright is thy delight." For these considerations are peculiarly suited to arm our minds against temptation; and to animate our hope of his mercy and favour. It is of great importance to have right principles early imprinted in the minds of young persons. Alas, how few parents continually endeavour, by instruction, conversation, and example, to convince their children, that "Better is a little with the fear of the Lord, than great treasure, and trouble therewith!" How few seem to believe it themselves! yet it is the sure testimony of God; and confirmed by universal experience and observation. For indeed "godliness with contentment is great gain;" and they who possess it, have all and abound, even when the carnal eye sees very little; they have treasures in heaven, and treasures in the heart, and in the house: their present wants are supplied, and the Lord is with them as their Portion, and their Treasurer to supply their temporal wants, without the cares, troubles, and temptations, which accompany the revenues of the wicked. Brotherly love and harmony likewise spring from love to God, and their sense of his love to them: and this renders a dinner of herbs more relishing, than the most luxurious feasts of those who "are living in malice and envy, hateful, and hating one another." And as riches too commonly increase pride, and furnish abundant causes of litigation; the rich are seldom exempt from wrath, envy, and strife, which spoil all their enjoyment. By faith and prayer, they who fear the Lord and hope in his mercy, derive from him inward consolations: the discoveries which they make of the glory of God and the excellency of heavenly things, rejoice their hearts; and the glad tidings and precious promises of the Gospel, comfort and nourish their souls. A merry heart thus obtained maketh a cheerful countenance, and is a continual feast: but all other mirth is madness. Nay, even the sorrow of the world worketh death; cares, fears, disappointments, loss of friends, and other trials, when there is no hope in God or submission to him, induce sullen despondency, break the spirit, render life miserable, shorten a man's days, or even tempt him to suicide. But the grace of God teaches patience and thankfulness for remaining unmerited mercies, and inspires hope; and thus enables a man to be joyful in tribulations. Even godly sorrow has its peculiar sweetness and supports; it breaks the heart into a penitent and submissive frame, and makes way for joy in the Lord. And if any pious persons are dejected, this arises either from some misapprehension, or from the want of a more single and devoted frame of mind. We should therefore cultivate cheerfulness; lest we bring an evil report on our profession, and cause the unexperienced to conclude that we serve a hard master, and that wisdom's ways are not pleasantness and peace.

V. 19—33.

vidence of God; the power and duty of kings; the evil of pride, calumny, discord, and violence; and the excellency of prudence, meekness, and integrity, 1—33.

the disconsolation of professed Christians, arises from sloth and procrastination, which also very generally occasion the ruin of men's immortal souls. For the way of the sluggard is, in every thing, like pressing through a thorn hedge: a thousand hinderances and difficulties obstruct his path, which he has not vigour to break through: thus many are all their life uneasy, because indolent; they live in continual war with their own consciences, and in doubt about their state, because in continual neglect of some part of their duty: but the path of the wise and consistent Christian, who is diligent in his proper work, and exercises himself to have a conscience void of offence, becomes plain and pleasant. In like manner, many form very good designs, which come to nothing for want of due deliberation and advising with prudent counsellors: and thus disappointment enhances their uneasiness; whilst a man's purposes being established gives him inward satisfaction. That greediness of gain also, which springs from ignorance or neglect of a better inheritance, whether a man be rapacious in order to hoard, or to squander, instead of producing an accession to his happiness, proves a perpetual source of uneasiness to himself and family: whereas the disdain of filthy lucre conduces more to comfort than the largest gains of ungodliness possibly could. But this "way of life is above to the wise;" and fools never raise their hearts or thoughts high enough to desire, or even conceive of, such pleasures, honours, and treasures, as are found in it; but cleaving to the dust, or grovelling in the mire of sinful pursuits, they fall into hell beneath. For, refusing instruction, delighting in folly and mischief, and not so much as regarding whether an aged father or a tender mother rejoice or mourn over them; numbers reduce to practice the abominable thoughts of their hearts, till shame and conscience make little resistance, and till their crimes, by necessary consequence, plunge them into ruin without remedy. But the pure in heart speak such things as are pleasing to God and useful to man, and such as will give them satisfaction when afterwards recollected, especially at the day of judgment. They "study to answer," and often are enabled to speak a word in season, unspeakably more valuable than gold or precious stones: and they will eventually find, that the Lord heard and answered, in the best manner, all their prayers: for He giveth wisdom, strength, victory, and joy. Let then the hearts of those rejoice who seek his face: let the fatherless and widow trust in him; and let the haughty oppressor tremble before him: "for he will destroy the house of the proud, but he will establish the border of the widow." And let us all remember that the fear of God is the instruction of wisdom; and that before durable honour is humility: for he causes every man to feel his own vileness and poverty, before he confers on him wisdom, righteousness, honour, and immortality; or employs him in any very honourable and useful service.

A considerable part of the miseries of life, and even of

NOTES.

CHAP. XVI. V. 1. The grace of God alone prepares the heart for every good work; and the wisdom which he gives, dictates every prudent and pious answer and observation which we make. 'From him all holy desires, all good counsels, and all just works do proceed.' This is a scriptural and obvious exposition of the verse, as it stands in our translation: but the original does not seem to admit of it. Literally it is, "To man the orderings of the heart; and from JEHOVAH, the answer of the tongue." Man may form his plans according to the desires of his heart; and he may purpose what he will speak, on any important occasion: but at the last God will so order it, that nothing shall be said but what serves to accomplish his purposes. Thus Baalam could only speak that which God put into his mouth; though his love for "the wages of unrighteousness" made him very desirous of cursing Israel. 'Man revolves innumerable thoughts in his mind, but he cannot even list them, or move his tongue without God.' 'He derideth the presumption of man, who dareth to attribute to himself any thing, so as to prepare his heart; seeing he is not able to speak a word, except God give it him.'

V. 2. Ignorance, pride, and self-flattery render men very partial judges in their own cause; so that in general they vindicate or palliate the most evident iniquity or profligacy, in their own case, and still more their neglect of God and religion. But the Lord judges with perfect impartiality, and with complete knowledge of the motives of every heart, and he decides upon every action and character, according to the immutable standard of his holy law: no wonder then that his decisions are so different from those which men form of themselves.

V. 3. Whatever a man undertakes according to the will of God, either in his personal concerns, or in those of a more public nature, he ought to put it into His hands, to be disposed of and prospered by him as he pleases. Then he will avoid anxiety, and cheerfully use the proper means; and his purposes will be established and accomplished, as far as is for his true interest.

V. 4. The Lord orders and governs all things, with a view to the display of his own perfections, that they may be known and adored by his rational creatures; He is his own great end in all his works; and though some of his creatures have apostatized and rebelled against him, even they, though undesignedly, aid in displaying his glory. He is not the author of their wickedness; but he foresaw it, and formed his plan with a view to it. Contrary to their intentions, he uses their agency to accomplish many of his wise and holy purposes: he makes use of the malevolence of some wicked men to execute righteous vengeance on others; and he will at last be glorified by their final destruction, in the day of wrath and revelation of his righteous judgment. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5. (Marg. Ref. Note xi. 21.)

V. 6. Mercy and truth are constantly united in Scripture, when the forgiveness and salvation of sinners are spoken of. "Grace and truth came by Jesus Christ:" but nothing can be more contrary to the general tenour of the sacred oracles, than to suppose that the kindness, compassion, or faithfulness of one man to another can expiate, (for this the original means,) the guilt of his sins before God. The verse therefore seems to mean, 'By the mercy and truth of God, through the promised Saviour,' an expiation has been devised and revealed for taking away the sins of the world, and pardons actually granted to believers; and when sinners are brought to fear God, they repent, and "do works meet for repentance; and walk in newness of life." Some indeed explain it of the happy effects arising from the exercise of mercy and truth, in averting national judgments, and their remarks are worthy attention; but yet the term covered, or expiated, does not admit of this construction. These things may be a "lengthening of tranquillity;" but they cannot be a propitiation for sin.

V. 7. 'The best way to have our enemies reconciled to us, is for us first to be reconciled to God.' 'When all their actions and designs are such as he approves, he inclines those who were their foes to be at peace with them.' (Bp. Patrick.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8. 'A small estate, honestly got and charitably enjoyed, is much to be preferred to vast incomes, heaped up by oppression, and kept without hospitality.' (Bp. Patrick.) So indeed is the scanty maintenance earned by hard but honest labour. (Note, Psalm xxxvii. 16.)

V. 9. 'He showeth the folly of man which thinketh that his ways are in his own hand; yet is not able to move one foot, except God give him leave.' (Note 1.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10. As the future is often used for the imperative, in the original Scriptures, (though perhaps not so frequently as translators have supposed;) this verse may be rendered, "Let a divine sentence be in the lips of the king; let not his mouth transgress in judgment." Undoubtedly this is the meaning of the maxim. It shows how wise and good kings do act, and how all kings ought to act. Their edicts and decisions should, without exception, be the result of heavenly wisdom and justice: and they ought to be the more careful to avoid errors or partial decrees, as there is no appeal on earth from their tribunal. Who would have expected to find in this proverb a proof of the Pope's infallibility? yet it hath actually been brought forward as one! If kings are infallible, much more popes. Arguments must be extremely scarce, where such are alleged.

V. 11. 'If they be true and just, they are God's work, and he delighteth therein: but otherwise, if they be false, they are the work of the devil, and to the condemnation of those that use them.' Kings should not only do justice themselves; but see that their subjects do justice to each other, not thinking the inspection of weights and measures, and such other matters as may prevent fraud and oppression, beneath their notice; as the Lord himself peculiarly notices them, and accounts a just weight and balance his own work, his own appointment and delight.

V. 12, 13. These verses are in some versions rendered imperatively. 'Let it be an abomination to kings,' &c. As wickedness is more pernicious and abominable in kings than in other men, seeing they are the delegates of heaven for the punishment of evil-doers; so they ought to abominate it more than other men, and consider righteousness as the basis and support of their thrones. They should therefore discourage all flatterers, calumniators, officious informers, and lying teachers; and delight in those alone who speak the words of truth and righteousness. They who adhere to our translation feel the necessity of supplying the epithet good to the kings of whom they speak.

V. 14, 15. The monarchs of the East had the power of life and death, without any check or control, and often sent messengers to inflict vengeance at once on such as had offended them. A wise man would therefore be very careful not to provoke one so powerful: or if he had inadvertently given offence, he would make every allowable submission in order to pacify him: and many would be candidates for the favour of a sovereign, who could so much promote their prosperity. (Marg. Ref.) But this ought to have been an additional reason to these princes, why their frowns and favour should be directed entirely according to the good or bad behaviour of those around them.—The word rendered pacify, is the same as that before translated purge iniquity, (Note 6:) but here man, not God, is spoken of. We may compensate for our offences against our fellow-creatures: but not for our sins against God.

V. 16. 'Wisdom is, after all, eminently preferable to all the wealth or preferment which the favour of the mightiest princes can bestow.' (Notes, ii. iii.)

V. 17. He that is upright before God, goes further and further from evil; as a man travels on a high road, without diverting from it. And in keeping his way, he preserveth his soul. (Note, Rom. ii. 7—11.)

V. 18. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 19. He that is unambitious, meek, and contented in a low condition, and associates with the humble and peaceable, better consults his own happiness, than they do, who have the greatest success in pursuing the honours and riches of the world, and in contesting with haughty and rapacious rivals for the same idolized objects.

V. 20. 'He that understands his business thoroughly, and manages it prudently, is likely to have good success: but none so happy, as he that confides more in the LORD than in his own skill and industry.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 21. The man whose wisdom regulates his temper and affections, and directs his conduct, will at length be more honoured for prudence, than many who possess the most shining talents: and if he have the gift of conversing or teaching in a convincing and persuasive manner, he has a vast advantage for communicating the knowledge of divine truth to others. ‘help men to fame and admiration; but it is eloquence which prevails in business, and active life.’ (Lord Bacon.) —This is ingenious; but it can hardly be thought the meaning of the proverb: for the Scriptures by no means recommend that eloquence which often gives bad men and a bad cause the ascendancy in the most important transactions; and bears down wisdom, truth, and justice, by its fascinating delusions.

V. 22. ‘If fools undertake to instruct others, they only ‘make them like themselves.’ (Bp. Patrick.) Understanding is to the possessor a fountain of life, whence salutary streams flow all around him, communicating the instructions of life to others also: (1 John vii. 37—39:) but, on the contrary, fools pour forth foolishness, like poisonous streams, and by their baneful instructions widely propagate vice, impiety, and pernicious errors of every kind. (Note, xv. 2.) Some understand the last clause to mean, “It is folly to instruct fools.” It is labour lost. (Note, ix. 7—9.)

V. 23. The wise man’s self-knowledge and acquaintance with his own heart, in the various circumstances of life, joined with his careful observation of men, will always suggest something proper to be spoken to others, according to their characters and situations: as the accurate knowledge of anatomy directs the experienced and sagacious physician in respect of the causes of diseases, and the methods of cure. Thus he is enabled to communicate knowledge, pertinently, judiciously, and successfully.

V. 24. ‘The sweet words of consolation, which come forth of a godly heart.’ (Notes, xii. 18, 19. xxiv. 13, 14.)

V. 25. (Note, xiv. 12.)

V. 26. Men must needs labour, for their appetites continually crave supply, and eventually they enjoy the benefit of their labour. Thus we must either labour for the meat which endureth unto everlasting life, or perish. The verse, however, may be translated very differently. “The soul of him that is troublesome shall suffer trouble, for his mouth will be turned upon him.” ‘He cannot speak so much as an evil word, but it will return upon him, and fly in his own face.’ (Bp. Patrick.) The original word rendered labour, signifies either to take pains, or to molest others.

V. 27. Ungodly men frequently bestow more pains to do mischief, than would be needful in order to do good. They dig for evil, as if delving in a mine for the precious metals; they make diligent search to find out some occasion of discord or calumny, their lips are set on fire of hell, and kindle the flame of contention in families and communities, or the flame of lust in the hearts of others. ‘His tongue is a burning firebrand, to set all the world in combustion.’ (Bp. Hall.) The Septuagint thus translates this proverb, ‘The perverse man carries perdition on his own mouth. The foolish man diggeth up evils to himself; he treasures up fire on his own lips.’ Hear now the observation of a popish interpreter, and, it is said, one of the most learned and judicious among them, on this passage. ‘This is apparent by the example of the Spanish Inquisition, whereby he that speaks any thing rashly against the faith, is deservedly delivered to the fire, which I wish were done everywhere.’ (Maldonate.) ‘Thus in the most literal sense, this Jesuit’s lips are a burning fire, in which he would have us not only singed; but devoured.’ (Bp. Patrick.) Let it not be forgotten that this inquisition still is in existence and active, though the order of the Jesuits is abrogated.

V. 28. In various ways perverse men sow the seeds of strife and mischief. The whisperer, for instance, by hints, surmises, misrepresentations, and slanders, not only sets the nearest friends and relations at variance; but excites jealousies among nobles and princes, whence spring seditions, and destructive wars between nations, and even between the inhabitants of the same nation. Being a child of the devil, he is tormented at seeing others happy, and can only find relief in doing mischief, and rendering mankind miserable. What a hateful, yet what a common character!

V. 29, 30. (Notes, i. 10—19. vi. 12—15.) ‘Another sort’ (of the men of Belial,) ‘live by rapine, and persuade others to enter into their society. With profound study they contrive the ruin of others; and the signal being given, they furiously execute the mischief they have designed.’ (Bp. Patrick.) ‘This man is a furnace of mischief:’ (the man described in these verses.) (Sept.)

'Though men cast the lots into the lap of a garment, or into a hollow vessel, and thence draw them out again: yet it is the LORD who directs entirely in what order they shall come out; and so determines the matter in doubt according to his pleasure.' (Bp. Patrick.) What is chance to man, is the appointment of God.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16.

'True wisdom greatly consists in a practical conviction of our dependence on God, in every respect. He will assuredly be glorified in or by all his creatures. He hath formed, and he orders, every thing for himself, and the display of his own glorious perfections; so that the rebels against his authority cannot finally defeat any of his purposes: for a season they dishonour his name by their sins, and refuse him their tribute of adoration and obedience; but when they have filled up their part in his vast, his universal plan, he will make known his justice, holiness, truth, and power, by executing deserved vengeance on them. Thus while men of every character, according to their prevailing passions, and with all their sagacity, devise their own ways; the Lord, with secret but invincible energy, directs their steps in that manner which coincides with his grand designs. It is not for us to comprehend the manner of his operation, or to solve the difficulties which appear in it to our narrow minds: rather let us beseech him to direct our hearts into the fear and love of his holy name, and our feet into the paths of truth and holiness; that we may willingly glorify him on earth, and that he may be glorified in our eternal salvation. For when we habitually depend on him to prepare our hearts, guide our tongues, and direct our steps; our words and works will be such as we may with comfort commit unto him and his disposal, assured of all desirable success. Humility, which is inseparable from true wisdom, renders a man suspicious of himself, and afraid of the delusions of self-flattery, where eternity is at stake; nay, in the general tenour of his conduct, the humble man is jealous of his heart, lest he should allow of any thing sinful, and not be aware of it: but his only security consists in fervent prayer to him that "weigheth the spirits," after David's example, "Search me, O LORD, and know my heart; try me and know my thoughts: and see if there be any wicked way in me." How different is this from the conduct of those who, fearless of being deceived, are offended by the most friendly caution, and count for an enemy every faithful reprovcr! Let such, however, recollect, that 'Every one that is proud of heart is an abomination to the LORD:' and should such vain confidence become fashionable, and vast multitudes concur in it; let it be remembered, that "though hand join in hand, they shall not be unpunished." How evident is it, and yet how seldom considered, that "a little with righteousness is better than great revenues without right." For however it may be with the princes of the earth, "a divine sentence is in the mouth of our almighty King; his mouth transgresseth not in judgment." "Wickedness is an abomination unto him;" for "his throne is established in righteousness." His wrath is infinitely more dreadful than any messengers of death, for man can only "kill the body; but He is able to destroy both body and soul in hell:" while his favour and the light of his countenance are better than life itself, and far more refreshing to the soul, than fertilizing showers to the parched fields. This is then our grand concern. Man's true wisdom consists in avoiding the wrath, and securing the favour of almighty God: and who can estimate how much "better it is to get wisdom than gold! and to get understanding rather to be chosen than silver!" Yet who can help observing, how much more men in general labour to get riches, than to get wisdom or how much more pains they take to pacify the indignation, or obtain the patronage of an earthly prince, or minister of state, than to flee from the wrath of God, and secure his invaluable favour! But the true believer is taught another lesson. He is conscious that he has in innumerable instances offended the Lord, and that unless his iniquities be purged away, he must be for ever miserable: he depends for this pardon on the mercy and truth of God in Christ; but in order to obtain an interest in that redemption, he would make every submission, and use every means of grace; and the fear of God induces him to depart from evil, and to copy that mercy and truth on which he relies, and in all things to act with the strictest equity and integrity. And should he in this course meet with enemies and injuries; he dares not attempt to pacify the wrath, or court the favour, of man by sinful compliances: but he perseveres in endeavouring to please God, who hath all hearts in his hands, and who in this way generally influences a man's enemies to be at peace with him; of which experienced believers can often recollect many affecting instances.

V. 17—33.

Nothing is more observable in Scripture, than the repeated warnings against every kind and degree of pride. This hateful vice often shows itself, by self-confidence, and a reliance on men's own wisdom, industry, or ability for success in their selfish designs; forgetting not only that they are sinners, but that they are weak and dependent creatures. Whatever men may imagine, it is certain that this "pride goeth before destruction, and this haughty spirit before a fall;" it generally ends in confusion and disgrace in this world; and, unless abased in true repentance, it will certainly terminate in everlasting misery and contempt. Better then is it to live humbly in some obscure corner, surrounded with penury and contempt, than to share all the riches and distinctions of the sons of ambition and violence. This is the highway of holiness, in which the upright walk with God, and endeavour to depart to a still greater distance from every evil work; and in keeping this way, without deviating on either side, or turning back again into sin or the world, they preserve their souls from the destruction of the wicked. But wisdom also teaches a man to be afraid of deception in so important a concern: for the prudent Christian knoweth, "that there is a way, which seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof are the ways of death." We cannot please the Lord, if we act with rashness or acrimony: it is our happiness to trust him, but it is also our duty to seek wisdom from him, that we may not intermeddle with matters out of our sphere, or beyond our capacities, and may manage well those affairs which we do undertake: that we may prudently avoid giving needless offence, obviate the ill effects of such as have been given, and do our own business conscientiously, yet quietly and in an affectionate spirit. Thus we shall find good to ourselves and do good to others. Indeed understanding is a well spring of life to him who hath it, and supplies inexhaustible resources of salutary cautions, for the conduct of life: whereas all the instruction, which an ungodly man can give or will receive, is mere folly.—When the Giver of all good is pleased to bestow, not only an enlightened understanding, a sound judgment, and a loving spirit, but the faculty of speaking with energy and propriety, and winning persuasion; the possessor may hope to be very useful in diffusing heavenly knowledge and wisdom. A reputation for prudence gives additional efficacy to a man's admonitions and counsels: and the experience of his heart teaches his mouth, and adds learning to his lips. Such seasonable and useful words, meeting with a teachable disposition in those that hear them, "are pleasant as the honeycomb; being sweet to the soul, and health to the bones;" giving encouragement to the heart, and directing to the paths of truth and holiness. And surely we ought to be as strenuous in doing good, as wicked men are in doing mischief: but with what perverse diligence do many seek out occasions for slanders and strife! How do they sow the seeds of discord, and kindle the flames of hatred and revenge, by their calumnies, whisperings, and lies! How do many study to commit violence, entice others to sin, and employ the whole extent of ingenuity, to accomplish iniquity, and propagate vice and impiety! Such men live to do mischief, and to treasure up wrath; and pre-eminence in rank, or in abilities, renders them more like Satan, and exposes them to a deeper share in his condemnation: nay, the hoary head of a veteran infidel, debauchee, oppressor, or slanderer, is a ten-fold stigma of reproach. But the hoary head of him, who hath spent his life in doing good, and is found walking without weariness in the way of righteousness, is indeed a crown of glory. This man, though poor, and no way eminent in other respects, is more entitled to respect, veneration, and affection, than the most learned, affluent, or noble of the workers of iniquity. But when wisdom and righteousness belong to him who fills a throne or exalted station; when a king has the just ambition of copying the example of the sovereign Lord of all, by promoting the peace and happiness of mankind, and subserving the interests of true religion; when he abhors iniquity, provides for the impartial administration of justice, and takes all care and pains to promote integrity and equity among his subjects, by his example, and influence, and authority; when the favours shown to upright counsellors, statesmen, magistrates, and ministers of religion, give countenance to piety and virtue; when his wrath is to be dreaded by none but the workers of iniquity; and when a long life hath been spent in this manner, and a king is grown hoary in the way of righteousness, a father to his people, a blessing to the church, and a common friend to mankind: then the summit of earthly honour is attained, and only the crown of glory that fadeth not away, can add any thing to it. Behold a greater than Alexander or Cæsar is here! Incomparably, inconceivably greater. For if being slow to anger render a mean man more honourable and excellent than the mighty, and if the victory over a man's spirit be a more arduous and important achievement than the taking of a fortified city, how honourable is it for one, surrounded with every incentive and opportunity of gratifying his passions, to rule over them with steady authority, and to spend his life in glorifying God and doing good to men! It is true, that none can in these things command success: disappointment and tardy progress must be expected by those who would do good; but this is a labour which will redound to their own advantage, and be satisfying to their souls, though not successful to the extent of their wishes. And having used proper means, they may leave it with comfort: the lot is then cast; and "the whole disposal thereof is of the Lord."

V. 6. (Notes, xvi. 10. 12, 13.) A man's descendants ought to be his honour and comfort in old age. They should be educated in such a manner as may warrant a confidence that their pious and prudent conduct will render them such; and it is their duty to consult the credit of their progenitors, as far as it can be made consistent with superior obligations. And parents should act in such a manner, that their children may be respected for their sakes, and have cause to rejoice in their relation to persons of such piety and wisdom. And thus it will be, in proportion as men attend to the dictates of heavenly wisdom.

V. 7. The wisest maxims, and the most pious remarks, when spoken by a man notorious for his vice and folly, lose their energy and grace, and are received with neglect or disdain: but it is still more inconsistent, when princes, or priests, or other eminent persons, who ought to be the guardians of truth and justice, are so base as to impose upon mankind with lying pretences, and to deceive those that rely upon their veracity.

V. 8. 'A gift is so tempting, that it can no more be refused than a lovely jewel, by him to whom it is presented: and such is its power, it commonly prevails over all men, dispatches all businesses, carries all causes, and, in a word, effects whatsoever a man desires.' (Bp. Patrick.) What a description of the mercenary selfishness of mankind! (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9. 'He that concealeth an offence done to him by his friend, takes the course to preserve love: but he that will be calling every little unkindness into question, and expostulates on every occasion, will be sure to lose his friends.' (Bp. Hall.) Repeating grievances, and complaining of men's conduct to us among others, seem especially meant. (Notes, Matt. xviii. 15—17.) The word translated very friends, signifies a prince; and some give the last clause a very different turn. 'He that admonisheth the prince of his fault, maketh him his enemy.' (Notes, xvi. 28.)

V. 10. (Notes, ix. 7—9. xiii. 1. xxvi. 3. xxvii. 22.)

V. 11. Men of a turbulent untractable spirit, (the fool of the preceding verse,) are ever seeking to disturb the peace of the community, and to engage in rebellion, or abet insurrections: but they generally come to an untimely end, by the hand of the executioner; and indeed they must be treated with severity. The proverb is equally applica-more valuable, and will often be more respected, than a profligate son the scandal of the family; and his services may very properly be recompensed with some portion of the inheritance; or, he may be employed as guardian to the children, with special authority over "the son that causeth shame." In some way or other, however, he will acquire the ascendancy, and be considered more as one of the family, than the degenerate branch of it.

V. 3. Men both prove and refine the precious metals, by the furnace. Thus the Lord, by his providential dispensations, makes an experimental trial of the hearts of rational creatures: he searches out and brings to light what was before concealed; and by manifold experiments he hath shown, that there is no dependence to be placed on any creature, left to itself. In like manner, he has shown what desperate wickedness the human heart contains, and of what enormities it is capable when exposed to suitable temptations, and has detected the hypocrisy of many who were before unsuspected. By similar means he discovers the remaining evil concealed in the heart of true believers; he evidences the reality and the power of his grace in his servants; he makes them sensible, that they need constant watchfulness and dependence, and have great reason to be humble and thankful; and thus he purifies them from pride and sin, forms them to himself a peculiar people to show forth his praise, and prepares them for eternal glory. By these manifold trials of the heart, the Lord also discovers, and will discover to all the world, the justice and holiness, mercy, truth, and wisdom, of his final dealings with all his creatures.

V. 4. Flatterers, calumniators, and liars of various descriptions, especially false teachers, are welcome to those that are living in iniquity or hypocrisy: not only because they love their own image in them; but because they soothe their consciences, buoy up their hopes, keep them in countenance, and help them to cover their crimes and believe their own delusions.

V. 5. (Notes, xiv. 21. 31.) Not only he that oppresseth, but he that mocketh, a poor man, or derides him for his poverty, reproacheth God: he treats his providence and his precepts with contempt, and seems to blame his distinguishing care of the poor. V. 12. 'He meaneth the wicked in his rage, who hath she-bear, when enraged by having her young ones taken from her, than to encounter a profligate and unprincipled man, when impetuously urged on by his headstrong passions, and provoked to anger by meeting with resistance or disappointment.

V. 13. (Marg. Ref.) 'The punishment of ingrati-
'tude shall not rest in a man's own person, but descend on 'his posterity, to all generations.' (Bp. Patrick.) This is a fair exposition of the proverb; a solemn warning against this hateful sin: but it admits of an exception, in the case of those who carefully avoid the crimes of their wicked parents or ancestors. (Notes, Es. xviii.)

V. 14. When the bank or dam, that confines a large weight of water, is cut, and a small opening made, the current soon forces a wider passage, and a terrible inundation follows from a small beginning. Thus, when any affront is given, and anger begins to rise in the heart, if the least vent be given to it, one passionate and provoking word will bring on another: every retort will widen the breach and increase the violence of resentment: and durable malice or bloody revenge will probably be the effect.
It is therefore best to stifle passion, and not to take notice of an offence. For this strengthens the bank, and keeps in the water, without giving it the least passage. 'There'fore, ere the contention be meddled with, leave off.'

means of them to get wisdom.'

V. 17. 'A true friend becomes a brother in adversity.
'He was a friend before; this makes him a brother.' (*Bp.
Patrick.*) These maxims show men their duty. No change of outward circumstances should abate our affection for our friends or relatives; we should be constant and persevering in our endeavours to do them good; regard the time of their adversity, as an opportunity of showing disinterested love; and consider ourselves as born into the world and preserved in life, on purpose to help them at those trying seasons when the rest of the world forsakes them.

V. 18. Though it is a man's duty to assist his friends, especially in distress; yet he should not rashly engage for them beyond his ability, to the injury of his creditors, and the ruin of himself and family. Indeed there is great reason to suspect the reality of the friendship of those who would draw others into unreasonable engagements; especi-acts as if in love with sin and punishment. 'He that

V. 24. The prudent man keeps the maxims of wisdom and the oracles of God continually in view, as the rule and measure of his conduct; and thus his attention is fixed upon his path and what relates to it. But the foolish man regards every thing more than his own duty and safety; his thoughts are roving about every vanity, even to the ends of the earth: and he acts as a man would do who, in a narrow way, full of pits and traps, and bordering on tremendous precipices, should be gazing at distant objects, but entirely heedless how he walked, or where he set his feet.

V. 25. Solomon might speak the oftener on this subject, having an example before his eyes of the great ^a weakness of his own son, who it is not unlikely was a ^b perpetual grief to him. (Bp. Patrick.) (Note, x. 1.)

V. 26. It is very criminal for magistrates to punish those who have not offended, and to oppress and persecute their peaceable subjects: but it is also very wrong for subjects to revile their rulers, or excite insurrections against them, when administering justice impartially, merely because their decrees bear hard upon individuals.

V. 27, 28. A wise man will spare his words, if he cannot speak with a prospect of doing good: he will no more be a prodigal than a miser in the use of this good treasure. Especially he will be slow to speak when he is offended, or to intermeddle in matters not belonging to him, being ^a "of a cool spirit," as the words may be rendered. This command of the tongue and temper are of so good repute, that even an ignorant man may be accounted wise, at the small expense of holding his tongue, as if he were reflecting and learning, instead of speaking to expose his own folly.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15.

The depravity of human nature is peculiarly discovered, by the very general perversion of divine ordinances into occasions of increasing iniquity. It might have been thought that a house full of peace-offerings, would have been replete with harmony and love; and yet it was frequently full of strife and animosity. The Gospel itself has often been preached out of envy and malice; divine truth has been the watchword of acrimony, abuse, and slander; the cause of God has been pleaded with cruelty and persecution; long prayers have been made the cloak of the basest injustice; and the Lord's table approached from gross ambition and avarice, to secure emoluments, or the expenses of lewdness and intemperance; or to obtain power for the purposes of faction and rebellion. But as it would be far happier to feed upon a dry morsel with quietness, than upon the richest dainties with hatred and contention: so communion with God in secret is preferable, even to public solemnities and the professed communion of the saints, when these prove occasion of strife and contention. If we would keep a clear conscience and a quiet mind, we must shun all incitements to anger: we must suppress the rising emotions of resentment; and reject those hasty suggestions, which to the disordered mind appear pertinent and proper to be spoken, but which prove, like the cutting of a bank, and the letting out of water, and make way for domestic broils, implacable resentments, confusion, and every evil work. These we cannot avoid without much forbearance and prudence: we must learn to give as little offence as we consistently can in our own conduct: we must suppress our passions, when offended; and conceal, or make every candid and honest apology for, the faults of our friends towards each other. Thus he ^a "that covereth transgression seeketh love;" for he that repeateth all that he sees and hears, separateth nearest friends and relations, and does immense mischief, in private and public life, in the world, and even in the church. The Christian has nothing to do with the slanders of the day; or the parties, which pride, selfishness, or resentment form in the world, or in the church. He should also avoid those false teachers, who ^b "privily bring in damnable heresies," and who may be known by their fruits, and especially in that they are approved and applauded by ungodly men, and by such professors of religion as are of dubious character. He should not regard the good things, which they mix up with these poisonous ingredients, to render them more palatable; for excellent speech becometh not a fool, and must be used by him for some foolish and wicked purpose; and lying lips are not more detestable in a prince, than in a minister of religion: for as the magistrate, who ^c "justifieth the wicked, or condemneth the just, is an abomination to the Lord;" so is that teacher, who encourageth a wicked man in impenitency, or discourageth the heart of the humble believer, by false doctrine. The love of money has often warped the minds of judges to favour those who brought them large bribes: and wicked men, who can afford it, are ever ready to part with their beloved treasures, to purchase impunity for their crimes; thus, many called ministers ^d "teach things which they ought not, for filthy lucre's sake;" the rich are often willing to pay well for a quietus to their conscience, and an encouragement to their presumption; and thus they wrap it up, till the day of judgment unfold and discover the infamous business. For to the scandal of human nature, it is a general rule, (though it admits of exceptions,) that valuable gifts blind men to their interest and duty ; and whithersoever they turn they prosper. The good Lord deliver us from the love of money, which is the root of all evil, and teach us to lay up our treasure in heaven, and to set our affections on things above ; for otherwise we can never be steadfast in any part of our duty. When these alluring baits are presented to us, we should remember that the Lord our God maketh trial of our hearts, whether we will keep his commandments or not. And by various temptations, as well as afflictions, he distinguishes the hypocrite from the true Christian. May "the trial of our faith then prove to praise, and honour, and glory at the coming of Jesus Christ." If ingratitude to our fellow-creatures be so base as to bring a curse on a man and his posterity, how abominable must ingratitude be to our Maker, yea, our Redeemer, the Friend of sinners ! How great is his forbearance towards us ; and what cause have we to be humble and thankful ! It is of great importance, that we receive instruction and take reproof, especially those of the sacred oracles, in good part. This is a test of our wisdom, and tends to exempt us from numberless sorrows and sufferings. For "a reproof entereth more into a wise man, than an hundred stripes into a fool." This is every one's own concern ; for foolish and wicked men are indeed the shame and grief of their parents and relations, and the nuisance of society, being always stirring up strife or rebellion : but they prepare stripes for themselves, if not the rigorous messengers of justice to arrest them and lead them to ignominious death ; and afterwards they have nothing to expect, but the wrath and vengeance of an offended God. But a bear bereaved of her young is a faint emblem of the brutal ferocity of exasperated transgressors. We cannot disdain a poor man, or a slave, without reproaching the Lord who hath chosen the poor of this world : nay, the Lord of glory for our sakes became a poor man, and had not where to lay his head. Indeed wisdom and integrity are far more honourable, than riches or noble descent, which only shame their worthless possessors, and render them the scandal of illustrious families : whilst wisdom ennobles and advances the meanest servant, and entitles him to respect and consideration. We should also be very watchful over our own spirits, that we do not fall into the common fault of secretly rejoicing, or openly exulting, over the calamities of other men ; lest we should incur the indignation of the Lord. In fine, we should, in every circumstance and relation of life, endeavour to act in that manner which may be most creditable and useful to all with whom we are connected : and so to educate our children as may be most likely to render them blessed and blessings ; and this will most effectually tend to our comfort and joy in them.

V. 16—28.

It can never be unseasonable to turn our meditations to Him who is, in the highest and the most important sense, a "Friend who loveth at all times, and a Brother who was born for adversity." His love to us lost sinners induced him to assume our nature, that he might become our Brother, Friend, and Surety. This was the grandest display of the divine justice, holiness, and abhorrence of iniquity, which any creature ever did, or can behold. Nay, his becoming Surety for us insolvent debtors, when he knew how dear the engagement would cost him, was perfectly consistent with it, and a most glorious display of it. For the Lord's ways and thoughts are above ours, even as the heavens are above the earth. Whenever the distressed sinner applies for salvation to the once crucified but now glorified Redeemer, he communicates to him mercy, and grace, and peace : and he is the constant and condescending Friend and Brother of every believer, in the lowest scenes of adversity, in the hottest fire of persecution, in the hour of death, and in the day of judgment. And it is his will that we should be grateful to our earthly benefactors, and forgiving to our enemies ; and that we should copy his example of love in our conduct to afflicted friends and relatives, according as they need our help, and we are able to relieve or comfort them, consistent with other duties ; but to avoid all rash and perilous engagements. Thus the sacred Scripture in every thing points out to us the path of safety, prudence, and duty : it is an invaluable price put into our hands, to get wisdom, and learn the way of happiness, both in this world and the next. Yet, alas ! many have no heart to this wisdom, and are thus proved more egregiously and inexcusably foolish. Indeed we might all have been much wiser than we are, if we had duly valued and improved the advantages afforded us. May the Lord give us an understanding heart, that we may lay this heavenly wisdom ever before us, for the direction of our whole conduct : and may He turn away our eyes from beholding vanity, and our imaginations and desires from roving to the ends of the earth, that we may consider and look well to our goings. If we have trials from the misconduct of our children, we should remember, not only that they derived their evil nature from us, but perhaps also imbibed some of their prejudices, and were encouraged in giving loose to their passions, through our examples and neglect ; and in that case, we ourselves are in some sense the causes of our own sorrow. We should, however, bear this and every other affliction, with humble patience ; and watch against repining and desponding grief, which can only add to our misery, break our spirits, and dry up our bones : and we should cultivate a cheerful frame of mind, which does good as a medicine, to both soul and body. We should also study accurately our duty to all ranks of men ; what becomes every order in society, and in what true excellency consists. We cannot leave our proper rank in the community, by emulating our superiors, in equipage, buildings, furniture, or attire, without great folly, sin, and mischief : yet on this fatal rock thousands are continually shipwrecked !—As the Lord will call the greatest monarch to account, if he oppress his meanest subject: so will he not hold those guiltless, that speak evil of dignities, and magnify the errors of their superiors, or invent calumnies against them. A man of wisdom and piety will be sparing of his words, and not waste them to such unworthy purposes: he is of a more excellent, because of a more peaceable spirit. Indeed it is an invariable observation that "he loveth transgression that loveth strife." And even ignorant and ungodly men may justly be counted so far wise, if they hold their peace, and meddle not with things not belonging to them, and of which they are incompetent judges: but in general they are most noisy and busy, who have the least capacity to say or do any thing to the purpose; or, "who are wise to do evil, but to do good have no understanding."

NOTES.

CHAP. XVIII. V. 1, 2. Some render the first verse as follows: 'A hair-brained man seeks to satisfy his fancy, and intermixeth himself with all things.' And it is explained of the mischief arising from a self-conceited, innovating, intermeddling spirit in public and private life; and in affairs both civil and religious. But I find no instance in which the word rendered separated has this meaning: and the contrast between the characters described in the two verses, seems to require a different interpretation. The verse may be thus translated:—"According to desire, he that is separated seeketh; and he engages in all concerns." Whatever a man earnestly desires, he seeks after, and secludes himself from other avocations, that he may not be interrupted in the diligent pursuit of it. Thus it is in all kinds of business, or learning; none excel, but those who desire to excel, and who separate themselves, that they may have leisure to pursue their favourite object, whether more or less valuable: and even mischievous designs are formed, matured, and rendered successful in the same manner. The word translated wisdom, in our version, in some places seems to have that meaning; (ii. 7. iii. 21.) In one place it is translated the thing as it is; (Job xxvi. 3;) and there it signifies satisfactory knowledge of the subject in debate. And as knowledge is spoken of in the subsequent maxim, it seems to be here intended, and the meaning conveyed by our translation is preferable. 'He that loveth wisdom, will separate himself from all impediments, and give himself wholly to seek it.' A man has a strong desire to be wise, and this induces him to avoid vain company, diversions, trifling studies, and needless engagements, that he may have leisure and retirement to examine things to the bottom. But trifling and vain men have no delight in knowledge, except to make ostentation of it among such as are more ignorant and empty than themselves: a superficial smattering suffices for this purpose; and the way in which they seek and use their scanty stock, discovers the vanity of their hearts, as well as the poverty of their minds, whilst they show a way to make every body admire them, as wits or oracles.

V. 3. When profane and wicked men find admission into places of public trust, societies, seminaries of learning, or company, they soon betray their contempt of every thing good, and treat others with ignominious reproaches; and by their ill behaviour and wrong measures, expose themselves and those connected with them, to ridicule or reproach.

V. 4. The fountain of wisdom in the heart of a pious, well-informed, and experienced man, is like deep waters, which can never be drawn empty, but ever bring profit. This supplies him with inexhaustible resources for useful conversation, prudent counsels, and good instructions. These flow from him with ease, and as it were spontaneously, (like the deep and gentle stream,) and do abundance of good; and are totally unlike the shallow current, whose scanty waters, and noisy rapid stream, is the known emblem of the unmeaning, vociferous loquacity of a fool. (Note, xv. 22.)

V. 5. To favour the wicked is always wrong; but worst of all, when magistrates, from respect of persons, and contrary to justice, decide for the wicked and against the righteous.

V. 6, 7. The proud, the passionate, and the drunken; with those that give defiance and send challenges, and many others, enter into contention, as volunteers; as do all who intermeddle in disputes which belong not to them. Men of this description foolishly call on others to chastise their insolence, and they commonly meet with such as answer that call. Many are thus drawn into frays and duels, which end in wounds, bruises, or death; many incur law-suits and prosecutions; and still more bring destruction upon their souls.

Trans.) This seems more literal. 'A whisperer of false stories makes a great show of harmlessness, if not of love, — when he backbites others; nay, seems to do it unwillingly, and not without excuses for the persons whom he detracts; but his words sink deep into the minds of those that hear them.' (Bp. Patrick.) and incurably wound the very vitals. They infuse suspicions into those to whom he speaks, which embitter their minds against those whom they ought to love, and give rise to contentions that ruin their peace and comfort: and they wound the reputations of those of whom he speaks; they bereave them of their friends, and lead them into innumerable troubles and temptations. (Note, xi. 13.)

V. 9. Sloth and extravagance are nearly related; they often accompany each other; but either of them is sufficient to bring any man to ruin.

V. 10, 11. "The name of JEHOVAH" denotes his perfections, as revealed in the Sacred Scripture, and as harmoniously displayed, through the great Redeemer.—He who, under a consciousness of guilt, and dread of misery or enemies, believing the testimony, and embracing the promises of God, flees to take refuge under the shadow of his wings, by living faith, is "a righteous man:" and thenceforth, whenever guilt or danger, of whatever kind, oppresses him; he immediately runs to the same secure abode; and not only is preserved, but exalted. The unchangeable mercy, power, wisdom, righteousness, and faithfulness of God, are his security. His refuge is ever near, and will prove impregnable, through life, 'in the hour of death, and in the day of judgment:' and the righteous are "kept by the power of God, through faith, unto salvation." But rich men are prone to confide in their wealth, and to deem that their strong city and their high wall, to defend them from dangers and calamities. But it is so only in their own conceit; for trouble will find entrance into their castle, death will storm and take it, and judgment will sweep it and them into final perdition. (Note, x. 15.)

V. 12. (Note, xv. 33. Marg. Ref.)

V. 13. Eagerness of spirit, united with self-conceit, and affectation of appearing more penetrating than others, often betrays men into the practice of interrupting those that are speaking, and answering them before they have finished their discourse; by which they presume to confute arguments, and contradict conclusions, which they have not heard. This is peculiarly the case with vehement controversialists. But it is a great folly, and will expose the man to deserved shame; and will at least be a considerable abatement from his character, as a man of wisdom, humility, and meekness. 'But if it be a shame to a private person, in ordinary discourse, to "answer a matter before he heareth it:" much more will it be to a magistrate, if in matters of justice and judgment he come to a resolution before he hath taken full cognizance of them.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 14. The mind can well bear the infirmity of the body: but when the spirit is wounded, it is a thing most hard to sustain.—Even natural courage and resolution will support a man under manifold pains and calamities, if his mind and conscience be composed: and the inward consolations of the Holy Spirit will enable a believer to bear any tedious affliction or persecution without fainting. But when the conscience is tortured with remorse and terror; when the heart is racked with furious and disappointed passions; when He that made the soul, causes his sword to approach unto it, or even permits Satan to pour in his horrid temptations; no human fortitude can sustain the misery; even the believer, like Job, will be almost driven to madness and the borders of desperation. Nay, the incarnate Son of God, in circumstances of this kind, cried out, "My soul is exceedingly sorrowful even unto death." And unbelievers in such a case are often driven into despair, blasphemy, and suicide.

V. 15. (Note, 1, 2.) The prudent man, fearing the misery described in the preceding verse; will seek that wisdom and knowledge which may preserve him from it.

V. 16. A man's gift 'getteth liberty to speak, and 'favour of them that are most in estimation.'—'It will produce his enlargement if he be in prison; and bring him into the favour of great men.' (Bp. Patrick.)—In some cases, it may be allowable to conciliate with presents, when applying for any favour; and perhaps may here be recommended as a prudential measure: but too generally the present is given to blind the eyes and pervert the judgment. (Marg. Ref. Note, xvii. 8.)

V. 17. Self-love imperceptibly leads men to make the best of their own characters and conduct. Without design

18 The ^o lot causeth contentions to cease, and parteth between the mighty.
19 A ^f brother offended is harder to be won ^g than a strong city: and their contentions are like the bars of a castle.

24 A man ^o that hath friends must shew himself friendly; and ^p there is a friend that sticketh closer than a brother.

almost they adduce and place in a clear light what makes for them, and keep back or throw a shade over what makes against them; and they state inaccurately some circumstances, apparently trivial, yet of consequence: and thus the cause seems just, when one side of it has been pleaded. But when the other party, actuated by the same propensities, comes to search out the matter, and states it in his way, it will appear very different. Thus it often is without intentional misrepresentation on either side: but when that is taken into the account, as in most cases it ought to be, it appears evident, that no judgment can be formed, or opinion passed, upon any transactions, till the matter has been heard impartially from both parties. This maxim is peculiarly important to judges and juries; to caution them against making up their minds, till they have heard the whole evidence on both sides.

V. 18. 'If a controversy cannot otherwise be decided, it is best to cast lots, to know whose the thing shall be.'—When causes could not satisfactorily be decided; when the parties could not be induced to refer themselves to arbiters; or when they were too powerful to be dealt with, it was customary to refer the matter to God, by casting lots, attended with solemn prayer. Perhaps this would still be preferable to the perpetuating of discords and law-suits betwixt Christians, or to the embroiling of nations in bloody wars. (Note, xvi. 33.)

V. 19. It is evident by facts, that when fierce contentions are excited among brethren or near relations, their resentment becomes more implacable, and the consequences more terrible, than in quarrels among strangers. It is more difficult to conciliate their differences, than to take a fortified city, and their stubborn minds resist all endeavours to bend them to a cordial reconciliation, like the iron bars of a castle. The same melancholy observation holds equally true in the case of civil wars, religious controversies and persecutions, and the dissensions in societies.

V. 20, 21. As a man should be careful what seed he sows, or what fruit-trees he plants, because such will his increase be: so, and much more, careful should men be what words they speak; as they will at length be inwardly filled with the fruit and increase of their habitual conversation. For death and life are in the power of the tongue, and the consequences, good or bad, of men's words upon the interests, peace, or souls of others, will be recompensed to themselves. They who love to speak good things shall eat good fruit; they who love to speak lies, impiety, or iniquity, shall gather fruit accordingly; and they that love to hear themselves speak, will have cause to repent their loquacity. (Marg. Ref. and Notes on them.)

V. 22. A good wife must exclusively be meant, as alone deserving that honourable title. 'He that is joyful with a virtuous woman in marriage, is blessed of the Lord.' (Notes, xix. 13, 14.) 'He that hath married a wife, who is truly an help-meet for him, hath met with an excellent blessing; and ought thankfully to acknowledge the singular favour of God, in guiding his mind to make so happy a choice.' (Bp. Patrick.) He that has found a prudent and suitable companion is peculiarly favoured. And his success in this most important concern, which so nearly connects with a man's eternal interests, should not be ascribed to his own discernment or to chance, but to the kind providence of God. And he who desires so valuable an acquisition, should observe the directions of Scripture, and beseech God to bestow it on him.

V. 23. The poor are generally led, notwithstanding the pride of the human heart, to use the language of humble entreaty, in addressing the rich, even when they meet with repeated refusals: but the rich are apt to give way to arrogance and harshness, and to answer the humble petitioner with contempt and severity. This observation respecting the effect of men's circumstances on their spirit and conduct, serves to illustrate the nature and value of poverty of spirit: it leads a man to use earnest entreaties with God; and "he who is rich in mercy," will not continue to answer the humble supplicant roughly. (Notes, Matt. v. 3. xv. 21—23.)

V. 24. He that would obtain and preserve valuable friends, must cultivate a friendly disposition, and act in a faithful and beneficent manner: and the friends whom God raises up to a man, and who are attached to him for his piety and integrity, will cleave closer to him in afflictions, than his nearest relations who are not thus united. Nay, this friendship shall not be dissolved in death, but shall endure for ever.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13.

The most important difference in respect of true wisdom, originates rather from the heart than the understanding. Ungodly men, however ingenious, have no delight in the knowledge of heavenly things; and therefore, they can only seek them as much as may serve the purposes of ambition or interest, and consist with the quiet enjoyment of their sins: and they are too much occupied in other pleasures and pursuits, to separate themselves; and to "cry after knowledge, and lift up the voice for understanding; to seek for her as silver, and search for her as for hid treasures."

CHAP. XIX.

Commendations of wisdom, integrity, kindness, meekness, &c. The fatal effects

But when the heart loves wisdom, in some measure according to its worth, other objects will be disregarded or subordinated: and did we value it properly, we should all disentangle ourselves more than we do from various employments, studies, and diversions; and redeem time, for reading the Scriptures, meditation and prayer: nor should we suffer trifles and trifiers to deprive us of our precious hours, whilst we are so much upon our guard against those that would rob us of our money. When the heart thus becomes a well-spring of wisdom, it soon appears in the conversation; like the flowing brook, that with a copious and gentle current, fructifies the adjacent country. And whilst comfort and advantage accrue to others, from a man's wise counsels, pious discourse, or conciliating proposals, his own heart will be refreshed and satisfied. How different this man's discourse from that of those who foolishly suffer their "lips to enter into contention; and their "mouths to form a rod for their own correction, or a snare "for the destruction of their lives and souls!" But we should not only watch against the contemptuous and reproachful language of the wicked, and the cruel words of detestable tale-bearers; but even against the unseemly manner of such as, for want of a due command of themselves, attempt to answer a matter before they have had patience to hear it, and thus expose themselves to shame for their impertinence. Most of these errors and iniquities spring from pride and self-preference. Aware therefore of the odious nature and dreadful effects of this vice, which God abhors above all others, we should repress its first emotions, and mortify it by every possible means: for we are repeatedly reminded that "before destruction the "heart of man is haughty, and before honour is humility." Satan frequently gains advantage against good designs, through the indiscretion, or partiality, by which wicked men obtain admission into societies formed for pious purposes, and authority in conducting their affairs; "for when "the wicked cometh, then cometh shame, and with "ignominy reproach." And as it is not good for magistrates to accept the person of the wicked, and to overthrow the righteous in judgment: so it is equally abominable and subversive of all good, when partiality intrudes into the concerns of religion. Yet, alas! how often is this done, through the fascinating influence of wealth, which not only seems to the vain conceit of the possessor as an impregnable fortress; but even to others, as a most important recommendation! But let us remember that "the Name of the "Lord is" in reality, the Christian's strong Tower, which will never fail him that betakes himself to it: whilst public or private calamities, perhaps death, and judgment certainly, will expose the folly of "trusting in "uncertain riches, and not in the living God." In the common affairs of life, sloth ensures indigence, nearly as much as prodigality: and let us never forget, that neglect of Christ, of the means of grace, and of the duties of a man's station, will as certainly plunge him into destruction, as open impiety and vice.

V. 14—24.

A peaceful conscience and a joyful hope enable the true Christian to bear trials and infirmities, and even to meet death, with fortitude and comfort: but "a wounded spirit "who can bear?" And it is remarkable, that more in proportion of the superior people, than of the poor, become their own murderers. But if inward anguish here be so intolerable, what will be "the worm that never dieth," "the unquenchable fire," "the blackness of darkness for "ever!" May the Lord give us "the heart of the prudent, "that we may seek and find the knowledge of salvation, and "wisely hearken to the instructions and invitations of the "gracious Redeemer." He is "indeed a Friend that sticketh "closer than a brother," he will never, never forsake those who trust in and love him: and blessed be his name for those Christian friends which he hath given us, and whose constant and faithful love, for his sake, is our chief comfort, next to communion with him, in this unkind world, where brethren are often most strange to us in our distresses. May we be such friends to others, for his sake, and may we show our love to him by keeping his commandments, and promoting his cause, and not only by gratitude to our benefactors, but by kindness and compassion to the poorest of his people, nay, to the worst of our own enemies. How different from this kind and gentle spirit, is that rough and disdainful language, which rich and eminent men frequently use towards their inferiors and dependents! If they were poor in spirit, and humble supplicants to the Lord for his mercy and grace, they would soon learn more gentleness and kindness to their indigent fellow-sinners, who use entreaties to them; and without poverty of spirit, they will doubtless perish everlastingly. From the same proud and selfish disposition, originate contentions among the mighty, which often cannot be decided but by the blood of ten thousands of better men than themselves: and hence arise the implacable contentions in families and among brethren, which cannot be terminated by any mediation. How careful then should every one be, to shun every occasion of quarrels; and to do every thing that may cement union and cordiality among brethren! How base are they who sow contention in families! And what fatal effects may be expected from the smallest beginnings of domestic jealousy! All this equally, nay, more emphatically, applies to the occasions and first beginnings of intestine commotions in states. Such sparks of dissension should be watched and quenched, by all who love peace, as if fire had fallen close to a heap of gunpowder. But it is most melancholy to observe that controversies among professed Christians have commonly been conducted with the most indecent acrimony; and that, frequently proportioned to the degree in which they approach to coincidence in opinion; so that, whilst they who are agreed in all the great fundamentals of religion, dispute with virulence about some abstruse sentiment or frivolous ceremony; infidels, and those whose doctrines subvert Christianity, are often disregarded. And when the members of the same religious fraternity are betrayed into dispute, it commonly proves irreconcilable, and ends in another and so another division, almost in infinitum! In all these facts, not only the pride and folly of man, but the subtlety of Satan may be discerned: for love and union are the strength, the ornament, and the very criterion of Christianity: and disunion gives its enemies their most plausible arguments against it. As a gift maketh room for a man into the presence of the great, and into high offices, which having bought, he often thinks himself authorized to sell, or to render subservient to his own ends: so, regard to a man's wealth often makes room for him into the confidence or company of Christians and ministers, who would not judge very favourably of him if he were a poor man. Thus temporal advantages are caught at; and an influence is admitted, which secretly undermines the credit and peace, and tends to disunion and scandalous contentions. Indeed the self-flattery of the human heart cannot be traced into all its effects. None of us are entirely free from its influences: we can scarcely ever state facts, in which our own interest or reputation are concerned, without partiality; nor can we know where truth and justice lie, in contested matters, without great candour and impartiality, and patient investigation, which are peculiarly requisite to magistrates, umpires, and peace-makers. It is on this account profitable to hear what our enemies say of us, that by balancing matters betwixt their prejudice and our own partiality, we may form a better judgment of ourselves. By reference to the Lord, however, even without casting lots, we may generally avoid, or speedily extricate ourselves out of quarrels. He causeth contentions to cease, and parteth between the mighty: and he can take the fortress, or bend the iron bars, of an offended brother's resentment. (Notes, &c. Gen. xxxii. xxxiii.) We can never too much attend to the repeated admonitions given us, concerning the government of the tongue, and the improvement of that important talent, the gift of speech. Life and death, in every sense, both to ourselves and others, are in the power of the tongue: the beneficial or fatal effects of the tongue are incalculable. Indeed we should regard the will of God, and "acknowledge him in "all our ways." As he hath sanctified marriage, and pronounced it honourable: the believer, who deems it not good to be alone, should seek to him for direction and blessing, that he may make such a choice as may best conduce to his present comfort and his eternal salvation: he should receive the wife whom he hath taken as the gift of God, and love her for his sake: and if a man have obtained a pious and prudent companion, he has exceeding cause for gratitude; especially if he be conscious that he did not seek her in the prescribed manner. The same maxim shows us, with what view young females ought to be educated, and what ought to be their ambition and aim: namely, to be such prudent and pious wives, that their husbands may know by experience they have "found a good thing, and have obtained favour of the LORD."

NOTES.

CHAP. XIX. V. 1. A poor man, who fears God and behaves with integrity towards all men, is, in reality, more honourable, valuable, and happy, than a man destitute of wisdom and grace, who gives a loose to his tongue to speak mischievous things, however high he may be in rank or affluence.

V. 2. "Ignorance and inconsideration are equally mischievous: for a mind that knows not what it ought to choose, can never do well: and if a man hastily and unadvisedly pursue an end, (which he reasonably propounds to himself), and will not take time to deliberate; he must needs commit many errors." (Bp. Patrick.) This maxim is peculiarly important in religious concerns; ignorance can be the parent only of superstition and enthusiasm, not of true piety: and rash, inconsiderate attempts to propagate the true Gospel of Christ, generally prejudice the bulk of mankind the more against it.

V. 3. Men run themselves into difficulties and troubles by their own folly and wickedness: and then they murmur against the appointments of God. Whereas, if they had kept the plain way of duty, and not perversely turned aside into crooked paths, they would have escaped these trials. Thus sinners, instead of seeking salvation by the Gospel, complain of the rigour of the law, and make excuses for their crimes and impenitence, which, implicitly at least, throws the blame of their guilt and ruin upon God. "The folly of a man maketh his way sorrowful; and in heart he blameth God." (Sept.)

V. 7. 'All the kindred of a poor man hate his company as a disgrace and trouble to them ; and therefore, no wonder if his companions grow strange to him. He urges them with their former protestations or promises of kindness, but finds that signified nothing ; and if he earnestly implore their pity, it is to no purpose.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 8. He that makes the study of heavenly wisdom his grand object, best consults his own good ; and is the only man, who can be said to love his own soul, in a rational and prudent manner : and persevering in this pursuit, he shall certainly find happiness. (Note, ii. 1-9.)

V. 9. (5.) 'He that testifies to a lie, to the perverting of justice ; if the judge do not find him out, shall be punished by God : and he who whispers slanders and kindles strife, shall perish by these wicked practices.' (Bp. Patr.)

V. 10. Prosperity and abundance do not become foolish and wicked men : they behave themselves unseemly in circumstances which increase their insolence and presumption, and enable them to be more extensively mischievous, and in the event render them still more contemptible and miserable. Much less is it fit for men of low extraction and base spirits, to have influence over princes, or to domineer over those to whom eminent places properly belong. This is not uncommonly the folly of a weak prince, who makes some worthless minion his favourite, merely for his external embellishments, flattery, or willing subserviency to his pleasures. And thus he gives himself up to be ruled by his own servant, who engrosses all authority, and serves his own selfish purposes, at the expense of both king and people ; and treats with insolence the most eminent and respectable persons ; till jealousies are excited, parties formed, conspiracies and insurrections resolved on, and the state is thrown into convulsions. 'No man is fit to govern another, who cannot govern himself.' (Note, xxx. 21-23.)

V. 11. "The understanding of a man renders him slow to anger, &c." Wisdom induces a man to suppress resentment ; and to keep a strict guard on himself under provocations. A prudent man, even when it is necessary to reprove or expostulate with the offending party, will defer it till he can do it with temper and decency, indeed it is most honourable to pass over a transgression unnoticed ; and he attains the highest degree of true glory, who overlooks or forgives the most numerous and gross affronts, and persists the most steadily in endeavouring to overcome evil with good. Let it not be overlooked, that these proverbs exactly coincide with our Lord's instructions and those of his apostles ; though men in general think that such precepts are peculiar to the New Testament.

V. 12. (Note, xvi. 14, 15. Marg. Ref.) 'The more power a man hath, the harder it is for him to govern his passions. None find it more difficult than a king, especially in the heat of youth, to bridle his wrath. The young lion, as he is the strongest, so he is the fiercest of all others.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 13. 'Two things make a man exceeding unhappy ; a dissolute son and a scolding wife. For the former breaks the heart of his father, to see him like to prove the utter destruction of the family : the other drives a man to undo his family himself ; when he is no more able to live at home with her, than to dwell in a rotten and ruinous house, through the roof of which the rain drops perpetually.' (Bp. Patrick.) A wise man would take prudent measures to prevent such calamities : but he would not ruin himself and family, either because of the contentions of his wife, or the uncomfortableness of his house ; but rather beg of God to give him meekness and patience to bear what he could not remedy. (Note, xxvii. 15, 16. Marg. Ref.)

V. 14. (Notes, xii. 4. xviii. 20. xxxi. 10-31.) Splendid houses and large inheritances sometimes descend to men from their parents, without their own care or prudence ; and they are often given in Providence to very worthless characters. But a prudent wife is the Lord's more immediate and valuable gift to such as he favours ; and contributes more to his passing through life comfortably, and at a distance from temptation, than the largest riches with a contentious or wicked woman. 'A prudent and virtuous wife is a special blessing of God's immediate choosing ; and must therefore be obtained by our prayers, at the hand of the Giver.' (Bp. Hall.)

soul, or of temporal life: and the careless or obstinate transgressor must suffer the penalty of the law.

V. 17. Whatever kindness a man shows to the poor, whether by giving them money, or doing them any service, out of compassion to them, and in believing obedience, will be considered as lent to the Lord; and he will take care that it shall be repaid with large interest, in one way or other, to him or his posterity.

V. 19. Some connect this verse with the preceding: if he, (that is, the child that ought to have been corrected,) be of great wrath, he must suffer punishment; for if he be delivered at one time, it must be done again and again. Thus, if the parent spare the child when young, he may probably fall into the hands of the magistrate when grown up, perhaps come to an untimely end; or it may prove the ruin of his soul. A very different meaning, however, has been given to the maxim. "He whose wrath exceeds all bounds, and makes him severe beyond measure, undoes his child." (Bp. Patrick.) This is an important hint: but it does not seem the meaning of the verse.

V. 20. (Notes, viii. 30—34. Marg. Ref.)

V. 21. "Man's device shall not have success, except God govern it, whose purpose is unchangeable." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 22. If a man desire to serve us, that "desire is his kindness," and should be accepted as such, though he have it not in his power to do any thing effectual. Thus the widow's two mites were honoured, as the expression of her love to the house of God: Mary was commended, when she did what she could to honour Christ: and "if there be a willing mind, it is accepted according to what a man hath." (Marg. Ref.) By the same equitable rule the poor man who makes no promises, is to be preferred to those rich and powerful persons, who amuse their dependents with assurances of doing great things for them, which they never intend, or take no care to perform. This is a very common species of lying, but no better for being fashionable in polite circles.

V. 23. Some render this maxim in a far different sense. "The fear of the LORD tends to life: but the full," (or self-sufficient prosperous man,) "shall lie down in it; he shall be visited with evil." "He that is swollen with pride, and forgets God, when worldly goods flow in upon him, shall lie down at last in sorrow, and never want something to afflict him." (Bp. Patrick.)—The original is certainly obscure to us.

V. 24. Habits of indolence so grow upon people, that they have no heart to do the most needful things for themselves; as if a man were so slothful, that he would not take his hand out of his bosom to feed himself, and should prefer the gnawings of hunger to so trivial an exertion!

V. 25. (xxi. 11.) "The simple and ignorant learn, when they see the wicked punished."—"Some are so bad, that they must be handled with great sharpness, especially such profane men as deride admonition, and grow thereby more furious. But there are those who grow better, even by the example of severity against notorious offenders:—and a third sort, who, being admonished are obedient to those who tell them of their faults." (Melancthon in Bp. Patrick.)—In many cases the sharp rebukes, disgraceful censures, or severe punishments, inflicted on the incorrigible, are very beneficial to such as were in danger of being deluded by their mischievous principles, or seduced to imitate their bad examples; and are the means of rendering them more circumspect and prudent. (Note, ix. 7—9.)

V. 26. The debauched young man, who wastes his father's substance by his extravagance, or turns his aged mother destitute, that he may have the more to spend on his vices; or who drives her from home by his insolence and turbulency, is a scandal to his family, a nuisance to society, and will at length come to contempt and ignominy. Such monsters are there in human form, in every generation.

V. 27. "Cease, my son, from hearkening to instruction, in order to wander from the words of knowledge." This is the literal rendering, of which different interpretations have been given. "My son, hearken not to instruction, but with the desire and intention to grow better by it." But as a man cannot become wiser and better by hearkening to bad counsel and imbibing corrupt principles, the obvious meaning of our translation is at least implied; and it is of so much importance, that it should not be lightly departed from. "In order to profit by good instructions, no longer regard such as are of a contrary nature and tendency." As many "turn away their ears from the truth, and are turned unto fables;" so they that would hearken to the truth must turn away their ears from lies, especially such as are most plausible and agreeable, and set off with the greatest show of wit, genius, eloquence, and learning.—"Take heed what you hear;" and "Take heed how you hear." (Mark iv. 24. Luke viii. 18.) Insinuating infidels; skeptics, and ungodly men, who endeavour to argue young persons out of their religious scruples, and excite their contempt of their pious parents, or teachers, under the pretence of enlarging their minds, and freeing them from the shackles of prejudice and superstition; with all those ministers of religion, however distinguished, whose instructions are unscriptural, answer the description here given. They administer poison instead of medicine: and their books, sermons, harangues, and conversation should carefully be shunned. "To the law and to the testimony, if they speak not according to this word; it is because there is no light in them."

V. 28. "A wicked witness mocks if you tell him of law and justice, or of the judgment of God upon perjured persons." (Bp. Patrick.) "The mouth of the wicked" takes pleasure in iniquity, as gluttons and drunkards in delicate meats and drinks." (Note, xv. 14.)

V. 29. This verse seems connected with the foregoing. "But terrible punishments shall certainly be inflicted upon those that scoff at religion and conscience; nor shall other wicked men escape, who are such fools as to despise good instructions." (Bp. Patrick.) (Note, xxvi. 3.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

The wisdom of this world generally contradicts the holy Scriptures: and we need not wonder at this, if we consider who is the god and prince of this world, and by whose influence ungodly men are swayed. According to the maxims of this world, "wealth procureth many friends:" numbers of mercenary men pay court to the rich and prosperous, and entreat the favour of princes and nobles, whatever be their character, and are their obedient servants for what they can get. Nay, they flatter them, and write panegyrics on their endowments and excellencies; though their folly and wickedness are conspicuous to all the world! This is especially the case, when liberality, exercised from any motive, or by any or no rule, forms a part of the character; for then it is hoped that flattery will be well rewarded: and there are but few exceptions to the general rule, that "every man is a friend to him that giveth gifts," and has good preferments to bestow. Whereas poverty exposes even a wise and good man to contempt; "All the brethren of the poor do hate him;" and his relations are pained to see him enter their doors, or claim kindred to them. How much more then do they, who professed friendship to him in his prosperity, go far from him! Thus he is separated from his neighbour, and if he harass his faithless and unkind friends and relations, with entreaties and expostulations, it proves to no purpose; for they are still wanting to him; and he may sink under his calamity, or seek refuge in an alms-house or a work-house. But the maxims of divine wisdom declare, that "the poor man, that walketh in his integrity, is better than he who is perverse in his lips and is a fool;" yea, far better than those dissembling rich men, who despise and desert them. The Son of God hath shown poverty to be most honourable, by choosing it for his own condition: and "God hath chosen the poor of this world rich in faith and heirs of his kingdom." Let us then take care neither to despise those whom God honours, nor to envy or flatter those whom he abhors. If Providence have allotted to us a low condition, let us learn to be contented: and by cheerfulness, honesty, industry, frugality, and a friendly behaviour to all around us; by showing decent respect to superiors, without paying court to them; by avoiding every improper way of mending our circumstances; and by an universal conscientiousness, endeavour to show poverty to be respectable. And it is far more becoming the poor, and more comfortable to bring up their families by honest labour, and with mean fare, than to place confidence in rich relations, or to entreat the favour of princes, or the friendship of those who give gifts.—Again, whilst the proud and revengeful count it their glory to resent every affront: nay, would be disgraced among those of similar principles, if they would not venture on murder, and without regard to their most endeared connexions, risk their own lives and souls, in seeking satisfaction for the most trivial injury; the word of God teaches us, that it is a proof of a "man's discretion to defer his anger; and his glory to pass over a transgression." And who does not see how much more rational and beneficial this is? How much better it suits the present state of mankind, and conduces to a man's own peace, and happiness? As the knowledge of God, and of his truth and will, are essential to our present and everlasting good; the employment of time and labour in searching the Scriptures, and in meditation and prayer, is more conducive to our own advantage, than it would be if we could thus gain some powerful earthly friend. This is the true wisdom, which "whosoever getteth, loveth his own soul, and he that keepeth shall find good." Thus we may avert the wrath of our almighty King, and secure his favour: and then we need not doubt but that he will protect us and supply all our wants, as our all-sufficient Friend and Father. But while men neglect both the salvation of God and their own evident duty, they run into distress; and instead of condemning themselves, they charge God foolishly, and quarrel with him, as if he were the Author of their sin and misery. They complain of being unfortunate, and of having bad luck and a hard lot; or they throw the blame on relations and friends; and thus in numberless ways, "their hearts fret against the LORD." They who have inherited, or acquired houses and riches, should take care that they do not trust in them, or on the flattering and fallacious respect that is paid them. They should recollect from whom, and for what purposes, they received them; and consider how much good or harm they may do by their example and influence. A man's greatest troubles often arise from that quarter whence he expected the greatest comfort. For an ungodly, extravagant, and disobedient son, who brings scandal upon his family and ruin on himself; or an imprudent, unfaithful, or contentious wife, may render the most prosperous person extremely miserable. When the Lord gives one of his servants a prudent wife, she will add more to his comfort than riches could. But if, without his criminal preference of wealth, or external accomplishments to piety, he should find himself mistaken in his choice; he may confidently expect wisdom to enable him to behave properly in such difficult circumstances, for comfort adequate to the affliction, and grace to extract good to his soul from it. But though the Lord will not forsake his offending servants; yet the consciousness of having brought upon themselves the calamity by sin, will add a poignancy to it. So that the way of duty is in all things the way of peace and safety. Indeed every crooked path, every instance of falsehood and dissimulation, nay, of rashness and harshness, will certainly be awfully punished hereafter, or sharply corrected in this present world. And the more wicked men here live sumptuously and luxuriously; the more they lord it over their inferiors, or equals, or even superiors; (for "slaves have often had rule over princes,") the more dreadful misery and disgrace await them in a future state.

V. 15—29.

No man can warrantably trust in the Lord who is slothful in business. "For slothfulness casteth a man into a deep sleep," and he is not aware of the event, till he feels, that hunger is the portion of the idle, both in respect of soul and body. Yet numbers shrink from labour and self-denial, hiding their hands in their bosoms, and not having resolution to bring them to their mouths, till they are reduced to the most extreme distress: and then they bitterly complain, not only of the unkindness of their friends, but of their hard lot, by which they reflect on the providence of God. But they ought to know that man is not at all to be depended upon; and that God has not engaged to maintain the lazy and extravagant, even if they seem to be religious.

For there is little evidence that a man is really religious, who will not work; or who refuses to submit to Providence, as to his condition in life. How much better for a man to "labour, working with his hands the thing that is good, that he may have to give to him that needeth!" For "he that giveth to the poor, lendeth unto the LORD, and that which he hath given will he pay him again." But, alas, how few have got faith! And how little faith have the most! Men in general dare credit their neighbours with more pounds than they dare trust the Lord with pence: else they would deduct more from what they spend or hoard, to put out on this unexceptionable security, and on this highest interest. Thus indeed "wealth would procure many friends," whose prayers would bring down blessings, and abound in every way to their good; and every good man would be a friend to him, who thus gave gifts. But if we have very little in our power, we may buy into these funds as fast as the richest can do: for "the desire of a man is his kindness;" and the widow's two mites, given from proper motives, will go as far as the large donations of the wealthy. Indeed every advantage results from true wisdom. It teaches us to fear the LORD which tendeth to life, to render a man inwardly satisfied, and secure, that he shall not be "visited with evil;" and to trust in God and keep his commandments, and so to keep our own souls: whereas he that despiseth his way, and cares not by what rule he walks, shall die. Let us then leave it to those ungodly men who scorn judgment and justice, and make a scoff of the vengeance of God, to devour in luxurious living the wages of iniquity, and to treasure up wrath to themselves: "for judgments are prepared for scorners, and stripes for the back of fools:" and they are often here made examples of, that the simple may beware. Let us "hear counsel, and receive instruction, that we may be wise at our latter end:" for we have all been foolish and disobedient. Let us be glad of reproof, that we may understand knowledge: and study with propriety, when occasion offers, to check the insolence of scorners, and prevent them from doing mischief; and to give seasonable reproof to men of understanding, that they may be stirred up to do more good. Above all, let us cease to hear those instructions, whether from the pulpit, or the press, or the stage, or in witty and admired publications, or in convivial meetings, which cause men to err from the words of knowledge. For such false witnesses are of all most dangerous: others may, by their lies and perjuries, rob us of our characters, property, or lives, but these aim at the ruin of our souls: other false witnesses perish alone; but when "the blind lead the blind, they both fall into the ditch together." We need not envy their carnal mirth or jollity; seeing the wrath of God abideth upon them; and their insolence and licentiousness in prosperity must appear unseemly in the eyes of all sober men. Should they even be favourites of earthly princes, and lord it over better men than themselves, or persecute the children of God, they will only at length sink deeper in contempt and misery.

But we should still recollect our dependence on God for every thing. "There are many devices in a man's heart, but the counsel of the LORD shall stand." If he then be for us, who can be against us? Whom then need we fear? Or what more can we desire, but that all our devices may be directed to coincide with his holy will? When we educate our children properly, and chasten them when young, and whilst there is hope of rendering the stubborn will submissive and patient of contradiction; and when in obedience to God we repress our foolish tenderness, and do not spare for their crying: we do our best to render them a comfort to us, and happy in themselves, and to preserve them from manifold perils and miseries in future life. It is peculiarly important to govern our passions: for if men yield to evil tempers and furious wrath, they may indeed be rescued once and again; but should they persist in their contentious conduct, at length it will bring on them destruction, temporal and eternal. In short, God commands nothing but what is good for us; and forbids nothing but what is injurious: and the instructions of wisdom are, in fact, so many infallible rules of happiness.

NOTES.

CHAP. XX. V. 1. Strong drink of every kind, when improperly used, throws down the fences of reflection, fear, and shame; excites men to profane mockery of things sacred, to revile the most respectable characters, to ridicule or reproach their best friends, to commit the greatest outrages, to embroil themselves in riots and quarrels, to gratify the basest lusts, or to commit the most rash and ruinous crimes. 'Drunkenness is an enemy to wisdom, even in common things; much more in those of everlasting consequence.' 'Let him whose design it is to be wise and good, take heed of accustoming himself to excess of wine.' (Bp. Patrick.) The last clause may be rendered more literally: "He that errs therein, will not be wise." As habitual drunkenness is madness and folly: so occasional and repeated falls into that hateful vice, indicate that a man will never become wise or eminent.

V. 2. "The terror of a king is as the roaring of a young lion; whosoever is angry with him sinneth against his own life." "The word properly signifies, (not to provoke;) but to be angry, which is a kind of madness; for thereby he is provoked to such fury, as is in young lions, who are fiercest of all others.' (Bp. Patrick.) Thus nothing so highly provokes the King of heaven, as impiously and virulently quarrelling with his commandments, testimonies, decrees, and dispensations.

V. 3. (Note, xix. 11.) 'It is below a wise man, or one who is truly great, to scold and brawl: or if a quarrel be begun, it is no disparagement to him, but the noblest thing he can do, to withdraw himself from it, and let it rest: but all fools and lewd persons love to thrust themselves into contention, and fancy when they are engaged in strife, they are bound in honour to maintain it.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 4. If a husbandman, from sloth and unmanly fear of the cold, should leave his land uncultivated; he could expect nothing but want, when his neighbours were reaping their harvest: and should he beg of them, they would not be disposed to pity and relieve him. Thus they who, through sloth or impatience of difficulties, neglect favourable opportunities, either in their temporal or eternal concerns, must bear the consequences, perhaps without pity or redress, whilst the diligent are rejoicing in the fruit of their labour and self-denial.

V. 5. Designing and politic men endeavour to conceal their real purposes and intentions, that it may be as water in a deep well; yet men of sagacity and insinuation, often find means to draw the secret from them, or in some way to find them out. Many likewise, who are capable of giving wise counsel, are so reserved, or diffident, that there requires much address to draw any thing from them. But it may be done as waters may be raised from the deep well by skill and labour; and it will well recompense those who can effect it.

V. 6. Men in general love to be thought very upright, conscientious, and generous; and they are ready to proclaim to others, how much they have done, or intend to do, for their relations, friends, or dependants: but a truly honest man, whose integrity, veracity, and fidelity may safely be depended on, is as rare as such boasters are numerous.

V. 7. "He that walketh in his integrity is a righteous man: and blessed shall his children be after him." "He that doeth righteousness is righteous." He is a genuine son of Abraham, and inherits the blessings of Abraham. He is justified by faith, and shows his faith by his works. (Notes, Jam. ii.)

V. 3. 'When righteous judgment is executed, there 'vice dares not appear.' When wise and just kings take pains to look carefully into judicial transactions, and examine for themselves how justice is administered to the people in general; there fraud and oppression will be prevented, and grievances effectually redressed, as if by their very looks. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9. Where is the man who has a right to boast, either that he was originally free from sin, or that he is entirely pure at present, or that he hath made his own heart clean? If there be such a one, who and where is he, among the sons of fallen Adam? Men form antisciptural systems, and fall into self-flattering delusions, but the omniscience of God knows nothing of such a man among all the inhabitants of the earth. (Marg. Ref.) 'Who can say, and say 'truly, that he hath not the least evil affection remaining 'within him, no unruly passion stirring in his soul; or 'that he is so free from sin, that he needs no further purifying.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 10. "A stone and a stone; an ephah and an ephah." That is, one set of weights and measures to buy with, and another to sell with: some according to the standard, to produce to the officers appointed to inspect them, or to use when afraid of detection; and others, to be brought from their concealment, when the widow, the orphan, the destitute, and the dependent, who cannot or dare not seek redress, are to be cheated and oppressed. (23. Note, xi. 1. xvi. 11.) 'They are unclean before the LORD, even both of 'them, and they also who do such things.' (Septuagint.) 'Such injustice is detestable to Him beyond expression.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 11. By observing the first actions of a child, or the conduct, contrivances, pursuits, and even diversions, of a youth, a judgment may often be formed of what his character will be, when arrived at maturity: and indeed the propensities of human nature may be learned in the same manner. If children were generally observed to be submissive, sincere, docile, gentle, and loving to each other, averse to all ill and propense to all good; the wickedness of the world might with some plausibility be exclusively ascribed to bad habits, examples, and tuition. Yet even then it would be a mystery, (which men adopting that system ought to explain,) how it comes to pass, that bad habits should be so universally contracted, bad examples set, and bad instructions given. But if children are observed to be very early susceptible of violent anger, of envy, and of pride, to be humorsome and deceitful, to quarrel and to tell lies, to learn bad words and evil things almost without a teacher, and to be very backward to learn what is good, and prone to rebel with pertinacity against every exertion of authority: in this case we must conclude, that we are born in sin and the children of wrath. So that they who would know what human nature is, previous to habits, examples, and tuition, should watch their children, and inquire, "whether their work be pure and whether it be right?" The verse may also mean, that God notices the conduct even of children, and will require an account of them, whether their work be right or not.

V. 12. 'There are ears which hear not, and eyes that 'see not: but if a man have an hearing ear and a seeing 'eye, he is doubly bound to God, both for his sense and 'the improvement of it.' (Bp. Hall.) 'As the LORD is 'the Fountain of all good, particularly of those excellent 'and useful senses, whereby the knowledge of all things is 'conveyed to us: so the towardly disposition, which we 'observe in any child, to listen to instruction, and a clear 'understanding to discern, and a sound judgment to resolve 'aright, are likewise, above all things, to be peculiarly 'ascribed to the divine grace.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 13. (Notes, 4. vi. 6-9.)

V. 14. Whilst the seller often seeks to impose on the ignorance, credulity, or necessity of his customers, by fraudulently commending or concealing the faults of his goods, or by demanding an unfair price; the buyer vilifies them far beneath his own judgment of their value. Especially, if he knows that the owner must sell, he will run him down in the price, and pretend many faults in the commodity: and when by these tricks of trade he has got a good bargain, he will go and boast of it among his neighbours! But is not this to boast that he is an artful knave, who met with a man simple enough to be cheated? 'As fraud 'makes men dispraise that to which they have a mind; so, 'in the other cases, out of ignorance, or out of partiality or faction, nay, sometimes out of natural disposition, men 'disparage what is praise-worthy, and commend that which 'is good for little.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 15. Gold and precious stones were very common in the days of Solomon, who greatly enriched his people; and wisdom ought to have been equally plentiful under so wise a prince: but an understanding heart, and lips fitted to disperse knowledge, remained still precious, not only for their excellency and utility, but also for their scarceness.

(Note, vi. 1-5.)—^a Teach him wit, that he cast himself not rashly into danger.

V. 17. Under the term, "Bread of deceit," all things obtained or enjoyed by sin may be comprised. Fraudulent gains and licentious indulgences may for the moment be pleasant : but they will soon become like gravel in the mouth, which cuts the gums, breaks the teeth, and disgusts the palate.

V. 18. Kings, and rulers of every description, should be very careful that they do not rashly or needlessly engage in war. They should advise whether the object in contest be of that importance, to warrant so destructive a manner of decision ? And whether the power to be opposed be not too great for them to cope with ? If they must go to war, what armies they must raise, and where, and with what funds they may pay them ? What alliances they can form ? By what plan they may conduct the operations of the war, &c. ? Till such questions are answered, it is madness to involve a nation in difficulties, from which no human wisdom may be able to extricate it. "Establish thy thoughts by counsel, and by counsel make war." (Old Translation.)

V. 19. (Note, xi. 13.) The tale-bearer is commonly a flatterer. Thus he insinuates himself into the favour, and pries into the secrets, of one person or family : and then he goes and tells all he knows, with a malevolent comment, in another family : accompanying the slanders of the absent with flattery of those present, and in both addressing himself to the corruptions of the human heart. Whoever ridicules or reviles the absent, and flatters those present, may safely be deemed a tale-bearer ; and in the next company he will act the same part : who then would have any thing to do with so infamous a character ?

ally alarms them. In short, their prosperity is accompanied by the curse of God, instead of his blessing ; as both they and their posterity will learn at the last.

V. 22. Men are apt to say, 'If I should tamely bear this insult, and should not show that I have a spirit to defend or avenge myself, I shall be exposed to further and more intolerable injuries, and become a prey to ill-designing men.' But let no pious man speak thus : let him obey and wait on the Lord, and he will save him from all enemies and dangers. How exactly doth this accord with the precepts of Christ and his apostles, which many erroneously consider as peculiar to the Christian dispensation ! (Marg. Ref.)

V. 23. (Note, 10.) 'This is a sin so heinous, and yet so commonly practised, that it is fit to be repeated again, that it is a most wicked thing to cheat another ; though it be but in a little matter.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 24. "The steps of a mighty man are of the Lord : "How then can a man," (a poor feeble man) "understand his way ?"—Ungodly men can proceed no further than God is pleased to permit, and can effect nothing which he cannot render subservient to his grand designs. Pious men derive all their good desires, counsels, inclinations, and strength from him. Their works are in his hands, and their designs will meet with success, and produce effects, in a degree unknown to them, but known to him. How then can a man form plans, conduct operations, accomplish designs, or foresee the event, independent of the Lord ? In this case he must always be in uncertainty, as to his way and the end of it ; and he will find every thing turn out contrary to his expectation, or beyond his conception : for the Lord "turneth the way of the wicked upside down."

V. 24. Tithes, firstlings, first-fruits, and some other things, were by the law holy to the Lord : but many Israelites would be tempted secretly to appropriate a part of them to their own use : and thus they would be caught in a snare and involved in guilt. In like manner men would often vow inconsiderately ; and then be tempted to make inquiry how to elude the vow, or excuse the infringing of it. This sin likewise exposed men to sharp rebukes, from which they would have been preserved, if they had previously inquired whether they could cheerfully perform their vow ; or having 'A sacrilegious man finds devices to rob God of things that are consecrated to God, and then makes vows, in hopes by them to expiate his sacrilege.' (De Dieu.) A corruption which never more infested the world, than in this age, in which most men give nothing, but do all they can to take away that which their ancestors have given to the service of God, and the support of his ministers, and schools, or of the poor. By which they are guilty not only of their own destruction, but of the loss of the souls of others.' (Cartwright.) 'A man vows in his distress, to give something to God; but having obtained his desire, studies how he may be loosed from his obligations.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 26. The wheel, &c. (Note 3.) As the wheel crushes the sheaves, in forcing out the corn; so the impartial administration of justice crushes the wicked, and separates them from among the more virtuous members of society.

V. 27. The rational soul and conscience of man are as a lamp of God within him, which he may continually use in examining the dispositions of his own heart, and the motives of his actions, that he may become acquainted with his own character, form a proper judgment of his past conduct, and learn properly to act for the future. This candle should neither be obscured by ignorance and delusion, nor employed in conceiving, contriving, or apologizing for iniquity. Thus it is indeed extinguished or misemployed by ungodly men: but the grace of God causes the lamp to burn clearly and to better purposes. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 28. 'The strongest guards for the preservation of a prince's person, and for the security of his government, are bounty and clemency, joined to justice and faithfulness to his word.' (Bp. Patrick.) Let kings imitate the King of kings, exercising justice, truth, and mercy, "in all wisdom and prudence;" especially let them delight in mercy; and this will establish their thrones, (in the affections of their people, and by the peculiar blessing of God,) more firmly, than either mercenary armies, or mercenary courtiers can do.

V. 29. Young men are distinguished by vigour and courage, and are apt to glory in them, even when made a bad use of; and old men grow infirm and lose their comeliness, so that their gray hairs, an emblem of experience and discretion, are their chief ornament. But when the young spend their vigour to good purpose, it is really an honour to them: and when the old are wise, and devise and direct useful measures for the good of their families, the church, or the community; their gray hairs are really an ornament, and they have an amiableness which far exceeds all the fire and activity of youth.

V. 30. "The livid colour of a wound is a purification for a wicked man: and stripes, for the inward parts of the belly." 'Though stripes chiefly affect the body: yet they have likewise an effect upon the inward recesses of the mind, restraining the offender by the fear of punishment.' 'That this is the meaning of the words,' (rendered "the inward parts of the belly") 'appears from that elegant comparison of the conscience or spirit of a man (27) to a light within him, searching out and discovering his inmost thoughts.' (Grey.) Sharp punishments, by which the offender is scourged, till livid tumours remain, are necessary in many cases, and sometimes effectual, where all other remedies fail.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16.

If it were not notoriously evident, it could scarcely be credited, that men of the most brilliant capacities and accomplishments, as well as the ignorant and rude multitude, should be capable of rendering themselves fools and madmen, merely for the sake of the pleasant flavour, or transient exhilaration, of wine and strong drink! But fallen man, having lost his original happiness in the fruition of God, and not finding the vacancy filled by a moderate use of the creatures, foolishly seeks for satisfaction in intemperance, and proceeds to an excess in animal indulgences, to which none of the brutes can habitually be induced. Excess of wine, however, not only deludes the expectations of its votaries, and yields far more anguish than satisfaction: but it leads to scenes of impiety and iniquity; to outrageous passion, discord, and bloodshed; and to various most perilous and disastrous situations. It is not only a base and worse than beastly vice: but it runs a man directly into the snare of the devil, to be for the season blinded and employed at his pleasure. Whosoever then is once deceived by this sin is, in that instance, a fool: what then are they, who for many years together experience its painful and ruinous effects, and yet run themselves continually into the same fatal snare? In every station of society this vice is pernicious: but it is most terrible in those possessed of authority. How tremendous is it, when a monarch, (who is the absolute arbiter of life and death to his subjects, and whose frown terrifieth like the roaring of a lion,) inflames his passions and clouds his judgment by inebriation! In such a case, who can be safe? Whosoever provoketh him, sinneth against his own life: but who can be secure against provoking a tyrant intoxicated with pride, with exaltation, and with excess? Yet to such abuses is power liable, as exercised by sinful men! We may then heartily wish, that JEHOVAH, whose infinite wisdom and holiness secure the beneficent use of his authority, may be the only absolute sovereign: and that all subordinate rulers may be restricted by prudent limitations; that they may have power to do good but not evil, to be a terror to evil doers, and to scatter and crush them, but not to terrify or oppress those who do well. Authority, directed by law, and exercised in wisdom, is honourable to them and beneficial to the community. Thus seated in the throne of judgment, and showing a decided abhorrence of impiety and iniquity; they detect and frown upon the wicked, drive them from their presence, and exclude them from those important offices, which should be filled with such as, by their example, influence, and use of their authority, promote piety and righteousness. No confidence can be placed in ungodly men: they are indeed ready enough to proclaim their own goodness, and to make vast professions of their zeal, and readiness to venture or expend, in the cause of those whom they favour: but a faithful man who can find? Numbers flatter the very persons whom they ridicule and revile in the next company into which they go! And especially the divers weights and measures, and the false balances, which the Lord seeth and abhorreth; and the innumerable falsehoods and cheating tricks in bargains, which are often gloried in, show how deceitful and faithless selfish man is. But the Lord our King beholdeth and is displeased; and whoso provoketh him to anger, sinneth against his own soul. He will scatter and crush the wicked, and drive them from his presence into everlasting punishment. And, though none can say, "I have made my heart clean, I am pure from my sin:" yet every believer is so far made pure by divine grace, that he walks in his integrity, rendering to God and to every man his due, to the best of his ability. And this conscientious adherence to equity proves the best method of rendering his children blessed after him. Regard to the word of God keeps a man from various other sources of mischief. The pious man will count it his honour to cease from strife, and follow after peace: "but every fool will be meddling to his ruin or vexation." He will labour and endure hardship in this seed-time for eternity, and likewise be diligent in proper measure about his secular business: he will watch against the love of sleep and indulgence; he will fear that poverty which comes through negligence; he will keep far from those ruinous connexions, which reduce the spendthrift to beggary; and improve the advantages, and guard against the temptations, of his situation and relations in life. Wherever we turn our eyes, we discover conclusive proofs of human depravity. Even in accurately considering our children, while we may discern a vast difference in their tempers, endowments, and pursuits; we cannot but also lament the tendency to evil, in various directions, which every one of them manifests. But "every good and every perfect gift is from above:" and as the Lord gave them, as well as us, their senses and faculties, we should pray without ceasing, that he would bestow on them that special grace, by which they will be inclined and enabled to use his other gifts in a proper manner. Our thankful praises also are his due, if he hath, either in our own case or theirs, opened the eye, the ear, the understanding, and the heart, to the perception of his glory, in the person and salvation of Christ. We should desire for them, (as well as ourselves,) the lips of knowledge, far more than gold and a multitude of jewels: that they may both be enabled "from the good treasure in their own hearts to bring forth good things," for the benefit of all around them; and also understanding and address to draw forth from the hearts of other men, that useful instruction, which diffidence and timidity would have concealed. Finally, he who would know mankind, and discern the characters and purposes of those with whom he has to do, must first study his own heart: for self-knowledge, experience, and acquaintance with the word of God, confer the deepest discernment in this respect, and it is the most capable of improvement to valuable purpose.

V. 17—30.

The true interest of princes, is the same as that of their subjects: for wisdom, justice, truth, and mercy, securely uphold their thrones; whilst the tyrant continually feels that his totters under him. The regular and impartial administration of justice, a strict adherence to every engagement, and a delight in acts of clemency and mercy, as far as can consist with the vigour of good government, procure a monarch the love of his people; which is a surer protection than ten thousands of mercenary guards; who, by hope of better pay, may be induced to murder those whom they were hired to protect. The evasion, and equivocation, which men use with their consciences, respecting that part of their substance, which by precept, or by vow, belongs to the Lord or to the poor, but which is otherwise consumed; and the great ingenuity and care with which they find excuses for the neglect of their evident duty, show the deceitfulness and desperate wickedness of the human heart. It is thus that they who will be rich fall into temptations and snares, and into divers foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown them in destruction and perdition. Such bread of deceit may be sweet to a man, and he may be greatly pleased with his unlawful gain or forbidden indulgences: but afterwards his mouth will be filled with gravel, and the anguish of his punishment will far exceed his momentary satisfaction. Thus estates are often gotten in a very rapid manner; and the successful cheat or plunderer thinks himself, and is thought by the foolish, very fortunate. But a wise man sees that a secret curse entwines round such prosperity, and will never permit either the owner or his family to enjoy it with durable comfort.—Scriptural meekness, instead of exposing a man to insults, puts him under the protection of the Almighty. Pride and resentment indeed dispose men to say, "I will recompense evil:" and every fool will engage in quarrels to his own vexation or destruction. But the pious Christian conquers his passions, and avoids or ceases from strife, and when injured or endangered, he waits upon the Lord and spreads his hands before him, and is preserved. When the conscience, that candle of the Lord, is enlightened according to the sacred word; a man by it daily searches the inward recesses of his imagination and affections, and is employed in regulating his whole temper and conduct according to it. Thus he learns that his goings are of the Lord, and that his way leadeth to eternal life. At the same time he is taught to shun both flatterers and slanderers; and those who revile, insult, and curse their parents, whom they are bound by every obligation to love, honour, and comfort to the utmost of their power. Nothing but misery and ruin can await such monsters in human form; and if severe afflictions and distresses do not bring them to deep repentance; their lamp will shortly be put out in obscure darkness. But when the active vigour of youth is employed to useful purposes, it is indeed beautiful and honourable: and if pious and prudent young persons live to be old, they may hope, when no longer able to endure bodily labour, to become capable of advising and encouraging others, in the most important undertakings; and then their gray hairs will be more ornamental than even their youthful comeliness and agility were. For every purpose is established by counsel, and war itself is rendered successful by good advice, even more than by valour. But it must be said to great numbers, "Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light." They are still in love with the sleep of sin, and shut their eyes on the brink of ruin: nay, they are making war against God, by their impiety, and reproaches and persecutions of his people: and what can be expected in so ill-advised a contest? But let us make war against the world, sin, and Satan: let us do it with good advice, counting our cost, and forming an alliance with the Lord, whose power alone can render us victorious: let us enlist under the Captain of the Lord's host, and put on his whole armour: let us implicitly obey his orders and follow his steps: let us neither make peace nor truce with our foes, nor give them any quarter: if we be wounded, or baffled in any conflict, let us apply for help to the Lord, and renew the battle with increased watchfulness and vigour: and let us still wait on him, and he will save us, and at length make us more than conquerors, and give us the crown of glory.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXI. V. 1. The Lord formed and regulates the courses of rivers as he pleases: yet the water runs according to its own nature without any force put upon it. Thus he influences the thoughts and determinations of the human mind, to suit his own wisdom and holy purposes, without interfering with the exercise of our natural powers, as rational and accountable agents: and the hearts of the mightiest or most absolute monarchs are as much under his control, as that of the meanest person. 'Their wills are subject to the great Lord of all, who directs them as easily from what they intend, or inclines them to that which they resolve against; as the gardener draws the water through the trenches he cuts, to water what part of the ground he thinks good.' (Bp. Patrick.) V. 2. (Note xvi. 2.) 'For the weightiness, I suppose, of the matter, and the proneness of men to flatter themselves, and not to judge sincerely of their own actions: this is here again repeated.' (Bp. Patrick.) V. 3. (Marg. Ref.) V. 4. 'A haughty look, and a proud heart, which is "the light of the wicked" ('that is, the thing whereby he is guided,') "is sin." (Old Trans.) The word rendered ploughing more frequently signifies a lamp, or light: and it is difficult to determine in which sense it is here used. 'A lofty look and a proud heart generally go together; (that is, the countenance shows the disposition of the mind.) "The lamp of the wicked is sin." 'The lamp signifies that which men make the rule or guide of their actions. In this sense the law of the Lord is the lamp of the righteous: but the lamp of the wicked is sin.' (Grey.) 'The sentence may be inverted in this manner, "Sin is the pride, the ambition, the glory, and joy, (or "the business,") of wicked men." That upon which they value themselves, and for which they think themselves, "brave fellows, is, that they dare do wickedly.' (Bp. Patrick.) But our translation of this clause admits of an important meaning. The ungodly man does not perform a single action, because it is the will of God, out of submission to his authority, or from a desire to glorify him: and therefore even the ploughing of his ground, in order to grow rich, and to have what he may spend upon his lusts, is sinful as to its motive and object, and the spirit in which he does it.

V. 5. They who are steadily diligent, employ foresight and contrivance, as well as labour, in order to provide for what they may want hereafter; and generally are prosperous. But if a man use some industry, yet do not consider how to conduct his affairs; but goes about his work hastily, or engages in rash projects, or undertakes more than he is capable of managing, as unduly eager after the world, and in haste to be rich: he acts, as if his thoughts were employed in devising how to reduce himself to poverty.

12 The righteous man ^x wisely considereth the house of the wicked: but God ^y overthroweth the wicked for their wickedness.

13 Whoso ^z stoppeth his ears ^a at the cry of the poor, he also shall ^b cry himself, but shall not be heard.

V. 6. Schemes of growing rich, speedily and easily, by fraud and imposition in trade, or by lies, perjuries, or flattery, are learned by wicked men from each other, and are handed about as great mysteries and valuable discoveries. But they are vain and foolish projects; wealth thus gotten is vanity and vexation; and they who get it, act as if intentionally seeking for death and perdition.

V. 7. Destroy, Or, Terrify. 'He meaneth this chiefly of judges and princes, which leave that vocation unto which God hath called them, and powl,' (or exact from,) 'their subjects to maintain their lusts.' (Notes, Is. i. 23. Jer. v. 28—30.)

V. 8. The various paths of ungodliness and iniquity, into which men turn aside, are so many proofs of the frowardness and rebellion of the human heart; and of the blindness and folly of the human understanding, which are strange and surprising. But the few, who by divine grace are true in heart, will show it, by their works being right, i. e. according to the straight rule of God's word. The words are also capable of this meaning. 'As a man is, so are his works: a man of tricks will act strangely, (quite different from all that whereby we ought to govern ourselves;) but an honest man you may know where to have; for he acts conformably to the laws of righteousness.' (Bp. Patrick.) The honest man, in this paraphrase, must mean a truly pious person, as distinguished from all ungodly men: and thus the interpretation comes nearly to the same thing.

V. 9. (Note, xix. 13.) The most solitary, inconvenient, and exposed dwelling, is preferable to a large and commodious house and a great family, where the comforts of social life are embittered by contention; especially the contention of a passionate and clamorous wife. Such maxims are especially intended to caution men, in respect of the choice they make in this important matter; and not, for love of money or other worldly motives, to risk such a calamity as no wealth can counterbalance.

V. 10. The selfish desires of a wicked man's heart necessarily lead to baseness in his conduct. He is intent upon gratifying his avarice, ambition, lust, or revenge; and the reputation, interest, peace, connexions, nay, the life or soul of his neighbour, seem to him but secondary considerations: he is therefore ready to seduce, defraud, libel, oppress, or even rob and murder, when he can do it with impunity, and render it subservient to his purposes. No one can be safe who stands in his way: for he loves his lusts better than either friend or brother; so that none must expect to find favour in his eyes, when they interfere with his vile pursuits.

V. 11. (Note, xix. 25.) This verse may mean, that the simple, (or such as are incautious, inexperienced, and liable to be deluded by profane scoffers, and not avowed and hardened in vice and impiety,) will not only be taught wisdom by the punishment of the wicked, but also by observing how wise men profit by instruction. 'When the scorner is punished, the simple is made wise: and when the wise is instructed, he' (the simple,) 'receiveth knowledge.' He profits by the example of the scorner's punishment, and by that of the wise man's teachableness, or prosperity, for so the word may signify.

V. 12. Some explain this verse to mean, that righteous magistrates carefully search the houses of wicked men, to detect their crimes, that they may punish them. As we read it, the meaning is, that the righteous make a proper estimate of the prosperity of ungodly men, knowing that God will speedily overthrow them for their wickedness.

V. 13. They who oppress the poor, by beating down their wages till they cannot earn the necessities of life, and then refuse to hear their complaints; and they who will not relieve, according to their ability, those who cry unto them in distress; and such magistrates as neglect to do the poor justice against the rich oppressors, evidently "stop their ears at the cry of the poor." The number of beggars in our streets, many of whom are poor through idleness and drunkenness, or mere impostors in their apparent distress, and who spend all they can extort by pathetic cries upon their vicious indulgences, render an apparent stopping of the ears at the cry of the poor absolutely unavoidable. Certainly they who are known to be honest and industrious, and in real distress, have by far a preferable claim to assistance: few are able to contribute to both classes, and doubtless discretion should direct the exercise of charity; for every shilling a man can spare is so much committed to him, to be made the best use of that he can. But he who selfishly and unfeelingly disregards the sufferings of the poor, in general, without contributing his portion to relieve them, may now mock God with hypocritical prayers, but he will not be heard; and he may at length cry for a drop of water to cool his tongue, and not obtain even that small alleviation of his misery: "For he shall have judgment without mercy, who hath showed no mercy." V. 14. (Notes, xvii. 8. xviii. 16. xix. 6.) Presents, conferred to induce men to deviate from impartial justice and sincerity, must always be abominable: but a gift made to one who hath taken offence and is greatly exasperated, may be a proper, and an effectual, means of subduing his resentment and preventing discord; as it may appear a testimony of respect, and dispose him to conclude that the offence was not intended, or that the giver is sensible of his fault. But then it must be the gift of something which is known to be acceptable, and it must be presented with prudence and secresy, as conceding the superiority, and not as making an ostentation of generosity.

V. 15. The righteous delight in justice and equity; good magistrates take pleasure in the conscientious discharge of their important duties; and good members of the community rejoice when justice is impartially executed: but the workers of iniquity are alarmed at such proceedings, as tending to the destruction which awaits their evil deeds.

V. 16. 'He that will not live by those wise laws, which God hath prescribed him, but follows the conduct of his own foolish lusts and passions, shall be sent down to hell, and there confined to the company of the old giants, who, giving themselves over to debauched courses, were swept away with a deluge.' (Bp. Patrick.) (Notes, ii. 18. ix. 18.) Apostates seem especially intended. (Ps. cxxv. 5.)

V. 17. Addictedness to carnal mirth and sensual indulgence is inconsistent with a man's interest, both here and hereafter.

V. 18. The Lord ransoms his people from calamities, by punishing the wicked. He ransomed Israel by desolating Egypt; he slew Sennacherib's army, to ransom Hezekiah and Jerusalem; in short, he so values the righteous, that when their welfare requires it, he gives up any number of the wicked to destruction. 'God shall cause that to fall on the head of the wicked, which they intended for the just; by delivering the just, and putting the wicked in their places.'

V. 19. (Note, 9.) 'I had rather dwell with a lion or a
Vol. II.—No. 16.

'dragon, than to keep house with a wicked woman.' (Ecclesiasticus.)

V. 20. That plenty, which is obtained by prudence, industry, and frugality, is a most desirable treasure: and it may generally be found in the homely dwellings of the wise and righteous. But the extravagant and self-indulgent spend even their ample revenues in debauchery and excess, and thus run in debt, and involve themselves in extreme difficulties. (Note, 17.) Oil was a chief production of Canaan, and seems to be put for all things needful and comfortable.

V. 21. 'He that greedily lays hold on all occasions to exercise justice and mercy, shall lead a most happy life; and be highly esteemed, honoured, and praised.' (Bp. Patrick.) The marginal references show that infinitely greater blessings are included, though these are not excluded.

V. 22. Wisdom is more efficacious than force. A wise man, by ingenuity, prudence, circumspection, and perseverance, will surmount the greatest difficulties; even those which resemble "the scaling of the city of the mighty, and the casting down of the strength of the confidence thereof." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 23. (Note, xlii. 3.)

V. 24. 'A proud and haughty person, who may well be called a scorner, proceeds furiously and unsufferably in all that he doeth. He is puffed up with a great conceit of himself; he regards neither God nor man; he cannot endure the least opposition; but being enraged with insolent fierceness, he proceeds against those who cross his designs.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 25. The unsatisfied desires of the slothful wear him out: or, "refusing to labour," he is tempted to plunder, and so comes to an untimely end. 'He thinketh to live by wishing and desiring all things; but will take no pains to get aught.'

V. 26. Some make this a distinct maxim. 'The unrighteous lusteth all the day after evil things: but the righteous pitieth, and shows compassion without sparing.' (Marg. Ref.)

V. 28. (Note xix. 9.) He that testifies only to what he himself hath heard, or is fully acquainted with, will persevere in his testimony, and gain more and more credit; even if at first neglected.

V. 29. ‘A man resolutely wicked, endeavours to grow ‘so impudent, that he may not blush at what he doeth; ‘nor be moved in the least at any man’s admonitions or ‘reproofs: but a man sincerely virtuous, examines and ‘censures his own actions if they be amiss; and makes it ‘all his care so to live, that he may not be ashamed of ‘what he doeth.’ (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 30. Whatever appears to be wisdom, understanding, or counsel, but is employed in forwarding sinful projects, will in the end appear to have been madness and folly: and those plans which have been laid with the most consummate policy, and are conducted with the utmost discretion, cannot but be frustrated, when they run counter to the purposes of God. ‘They all signify nothing, if ‘they oppose the counsels and decrees of heaven.’ (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 31. Warlike preparations, however formidable, (of which the horse seems here to be mentioned as the chief,) are no more effectual against God’s purposes, than wisdom and counsel. The security and salvation of those whom he favours are effected without them; and the destruction of his enemies cannot by them be prevented.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16.

As we are extremely prone to confide in second causes, or to perplex ourselves about them, we need repeated admonitions, that God is the great first Cause of all. Faith rests on this truth: and the believer, in proportion to his faith, perceiving that the Lord rules every heart, seeks to have his own heart directed in his fear and love; and then relies on Him to restrain, incline, or change the hearts of others, as may best prevent their injuring him, or dispose them to help and favour him. Should then some potentate menace vengeance against him; instead of seeking to appease his wrath by sinful compliances, he will make “the name of the Lord his strong tower,” and by fervent prayer seek to him to dispose the prince’s heart to lenity. (Notes, Gen. xxxii. xxxiii.) On the other hand, should he need the countenance and assistance of the king or his nobles, he would make his first application to Him who hath their hearts in his hand. (Notes, Neh. i.) And this carries him through the greatest difficulties and improbabilities. For prayer can unlock all gates, divide rivers and seas, and even remove mountains; when it engages the arm of the Almighty to support the cause or succeed the measures of his servants. If we then profess to be of that fa-but as for the upright, ^d he ‡ directeth his way.

30 There is ^e no wisdom nor understanding nor counsel against the Lord.

voured company, we ought most of all to fear, “lest our “way should be right in our own eyes,” but wrong in his sight, “who pondereth the hearts.” Here is the preciousness of true knowledge: for “the man that wandereth “out of the way of understanding,” and remains in ignorance or embraces error, because he hateth the truth and loveth sin, “must remain in the congregation of the dead.” Through ignorance and error, poor wretched sinners are rendered arrogant and vain-glorious: and their high looks and proud hearts are their sin and condemnation: and while they glory in the management or success of their temporal concerns, they seldom consider, that the covetous, ambitious, or sensual motives, by which they are actuated, render the employments, which are most lawful in themselves, acts of selfishness and disobedience, as performed by them. To do justice and judgment are more acceptable to the Lord, than any sacrifices we can offer; though it doth not supersede the necessity of the Redeemer’s sacrifice of inestimable value, or of our entire dependence on it. He who is taught according to the word of God, will escape many ruinous extremes. He will not desire those riches which are got by lies or robbery: for however ungodly men toss this vanity to and fro, and please themselves with it; yet, he knows that in so doing they seek death; and that destruction will be to the workers of iniquity who refuse to do judgment. He wisely considers the splendid houses of prosperous sinners; and, foreseeing their overthrow, he desires and envies nothing that they possess. And he had rather deny his vanity a useless ornament, or his appetite an injurious or needless gratification, or even be censured for not treating his rich friends according to their expectation; than be condemned for stopping his ears at the cry of the poor: and as he cries and hopes for mercy from God, he dares not embezzle or waste that which was intrusted to him for the relief of such as are distressed; lest he should call for mercy from God and not be heard. The judicious Christian will also avoid all those hasty schemes, by which many ruin themselves. He will study by frugality and industry to keep out of temptation to mean dependence or shuffling dishonesty; and he will be ready to labour, that he may have to give to him that needeth. But after every warning, wicked men sin on without fear or shame, getting all they can by their injustice, and spending it upon their lusts; and showing no mercy or favour to their neighbours, because of the evil which their souls desire. So froward and strange is the way of man, as left to himself! so different from that of “the pure, whose work is right!” Hence it is, that while the righteous delight in justice and mercy; the workers of iniquity are not only determined to go on in the way of destruction, but show scorn and enmity against those, who “run not with them to the same excess of riot” and

CHAP XXII.

The worth of a good name ; and the dependence of both rich and poor on God, 1, 2. Commendations of prudence, humility, piety, charity, and the proper tuition of children ; and cautions against frowardness, iniquity, sloth, intimacy with bad women, and oppression, 3—16. An address to the rea-impiety ! Nay, their anger and hatred are often more vehement against those who testify of them that their works are evil, than against such as behave most injuriously and deceitfully towards them : so that, while in the latter case, a few well-timed and acceptable gifts will pacify their strongest wrath ; in the latter the most persevering, disinterested, and liberal kindness are insufficient to conciliate them ! When sinners arrive at this pitch of hardened impiety ; it seems almost desirable, though awful in itself, that some punishment may overtake them, which may make the simple wise enough to shun their destructive paths, to imitate the wise who hearken to instruction, and to escape the miseries which scorers must undergo ; and thus become happy in themselves, and blessings in the families to which they belong ; and, instead of driving their nearest relatives into retirement, or into bad company to escape contention, make numbers ready to say, "Happy are" even "thy servants which stand continually before thee, and hear thy wisdom," share thy amiable society and kindness, and witness thy edifying example.

V. 17—31.

He that has a well grounded assurance that God is on his side, need not fear what man can do to him ; for there is no wisdom, nor understanding, nor counsel "against the LORD ;" nor can any power reach those whom he protects. And though "the horse may be prepared against the day of battle ;" and various means may be used to secure our persons and habitations ; yet safety is only from the LORD. But in vain do men expect to please a holy and omniscient God by such formal services, as the unconverted, while persisting in their evil courses, can present ; even when they offer them in a kind of ignorant sincerity. How greatly then must he abhor the most costly oblations, or abundant devotions of those who are consciously hypocrites ; and who employ these methods with a most wicked mind, to mask their covetousness, oppression, or secret licentiousness, and to blind the eyes of their fellow-creatures. True repentance, and reliance on the mercy of God in Christ Jesus, always influence men to follow after righteousness and mercy in their own conduct. Such believers, and such only, "find life, righteousness, and honour." "They seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness ; and all other things are added to them." Thus they generally partake of the desirable treasures found in the dwellings of the wise, which they obtain with credit and a good conscience, enjoy with gratitude, and use to the best of purposes. To this plenteousness their thoughts, as well as labours, tend. They desire, in submission to Providence, to have things needful and comfortable for themselves and families, and to be enabled to use hospitality without grudging. They will not therefore spend all for themselves as foolish men do ; being aware that they who love pleasure and indulge their appe-ties, will always be too poor to do much good to their indigent neighbours. Though they do not account riches worthy of being obtained by iniquity, or of being idolized, yet they consider them as too good to be wasted in revelings, banquetings, and other extravagant expenses ; and though not disposed to look on honest poverty, as an intolerable evil ; they dread and shun the disgraceful and ruinous "desires of the slothful, whose hands refuse to labour ;" even when "he coveteth greedily all the day long." By the due government of their appetites and passions, and by keeping their tongues, they preserve their souls from numberless troubles, to which the sensual, the passionate, and the loquacious expose themselves : and, learning wisdom from its very source, they are enabled to accomplish important designs, for their own good and that of others, in a quiet and unexceptionable manner ; while the "proud and haughty scorers, who deal in proud wrath," render themselves hated and dreaded ; and with all their violence, (even when possessed of sagacity and power,) seldom prosper in their enterprises. For the great Disposer of all events so orders it, that "The wicked is a ransom for the righteous ; and the transgressor for the upright." The consistent Christian is always a lover of peace ; and ready to give up any thing, except his duty, for the sake of it. He will not, therefore, either in private, or in a court of justice, be a false witness : but if called to bear his testimony, he must speak constantly, and declare what he knows ; whatever offence it may give, or however it may tend to the condemnation of the guilty. Much more then must the minister of the Gospel speak constantly the whole of his message ; whatever ridicule, anger, and obloquy he may incur by his faithfulness, from proud and haughty scorers ; for in this case especially, "A false witness shall perish ;" and generally he occasions the ruin of multitudes along with him.—That state of the judgment and heart, which is produced by Christian principles, will never permit a man to risk the want or the loss of domestic peace, for the sake of acquiring an accession of wealth : knowing that it is better to dwell in a garret or a desert, than with a brawling woman in a wide house. But should his patience be exercised by such a painful trial, he will shun embittered contention, by retiring into any corner, or into the fields and deserts, that he may pour out his heart before God, rather than run into temptation, into vain company, excess, or the society of other women. Nay, he will not despair but that, by meekness, prudence, patience, firmness, and persevering kindness ; and by constant prayer to Him who hath all hearts in his hand, the cross may at length be removed, or at least its worst effects prevented. For as every thing lawful may be rendered a part of a believer's duty, so every event may subserve his growth in grace ; whilst even the lawful and needful employments of ungodly men become their sin ; and their best comforts tend to their increasing condemnation.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXII. V. 1. A reputation for wisdom, piety, and integrity, is far more valuable than great riches; and the loving favour which it procures, renders a man more respected than wealth can do: and whilst affluence commonly tempts the possessor to give a loose to his inclinations, an established character is a perpetual restraint, and renders a man doubly watchful against every kind of impropriety. Above all, it enables him to do more good, than riches without a good name can do: it gives peculiar influence, and adds energy to all his counsels, exhortations, and measures; and it obtains him access to such opportunities of usefulness, and enables him to compass such designs, as otherwise had been impracticable. (Notes, Ec. vii. 1. x. 1.)

V. 2. The rich and poor live together on earth, and but seldom without envy and contempt, though they have mutually need of one another. They will likewise soon meet in the grave, and at the judgment-seat they will be convened before their common Maker. He bath wise reasons for making this difference in their outward station; but he will judge them, without respect of persons, concerning the manner in which they have discharged their respective duties. 'The wisdom of God hath not thought fit to make all men rich, or all poor; but hath intermixed the one with the other, that each of them might have use of the other; neither is it for the wealthy to insult upon or oppress the needy; since it is God that hath made them both such as they are; and he both can and will revenge any unjust measure that is offered by the one to the other.' (Bp. Hall.)

V. 3. Prudence consists very much in foreseeing the various evils to which men are exposed, and discerning the methods by which they may escape. In temporal affairs, however, they can seldom proceed beyond probability, in either respect: but in the concerns of the soul, faith foresees the evil coming upon sinners in the eternal state, and discerns Jesus Christ as the Refuge from this impending storm; and the believer flees thither, hides himself, and is safe as Noah in the ark. But the careless and unbelieving, go on without concern, till, for the first time, they "lift up their eyes in hell, being in torments." (xxvii. 12.)

V. 4. (Notes, iii. 7—11. xv. 33.)

V. 5. (Notes, xv. 19. Ps. xi. 6.) The man who takes proper care either of his life or soul, will shun the society, that he may escape the thorns and snares which are in the way of designing ungodly men.

V. 6. When children are instructed from infancy in the truths and ways of God; when they are inured to submission, industry, and the government of their passions; when they are restrained and corrected, with a due mixture of firmness and affection; when they are trained up, as soldiers are disciplined to handle their arms, endure hardship, keep their ranks, and obey orders; and when all is enforced by good examples set before them, and constant prayers made for and with them: they generally retain the early impression even to old age. If they turn aside into devious paths, they always have an inward check, and will frequently be brought back again: and the good effects will commonly be visible to the end of their lives. But a way of talking to children about religion, whilst they are left to contract bad habits, and to indulge wayward tempers; and whilst they see little or nothing of the tendency of the Gospel in the conduct of their parents, or teachers, is very different from this "nurture and admonition of the Lord;" and often leaves a rooted prejudice in the mind against those truths, of which they heard much, but perceived no good effects. (15.)

V. 7. This proverb shows how important it is for every man, who would consult his own inclinations, or act according to his own judgment and conscience, to be frugal and industrious; and to keep as much as he can out of debt: for the rich too commonly domineer over the poor. And even they who are not poor, if on any account they lay themselves under great obligations, by borrowing money, are frequently treated as servants to the lenders; who sometimes expect even sinful compliances from them, and call them ungrateful if they refuse to make them.

V. 8. And the, &c. The power, which many possess and abuse, of making others feel the weight of their resentment, will soon fail them; and then they must reap the fruits of their injustice and oppression. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9. 'Whoso is liberal of his meat, men shall speak well of him; and the report of his good house-keeping

‘ will be believed: but against him that is a niggard of his meat the whole city shall murmur, and the testimonies of his niggardliness shall not be doubted of.’ (Ecclesiasticus.) The good of eye, (Marg.) is the opposite to the evil eye, which marks out those who envy, and grudge, and are niggardly and selfish. (Marg. Ref.)—The bountiful shall not only be spoken well of by men, but also, when their bounty springs from proper motives, receive an abundant blessing from God. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10. Profane scoffers and contentious revilers disturb the peace of every family, society, or company, into which they gain admission, and where they are allowed to continue, or have any influence: the only method therefore of obtaining or restoring peace, is to expel them: and even if this be painful, and expose them to imminent peril, it is only like pulling down a ruinous house to stop the progress of a conflagration.

V. 11. The construction of this verse is peculiarly difficult: so that some think it is imperfect, and that the word JEHOVAH in the first clause has been omitted by the negligence of transcribers: and the Septuagint countenances this supposition. Accordingly they would thus render the verse. “The LORD loveth purity of heart: the king is a friend to the grace of the lips.”—‘Purity of the heart alone, gives favour in the sight of God: though eloquence of speech and gracefulness of address may be sufficient to recommend a man to the favour of his prince.’ (Grey.)—The authority of the Septuagint, however, in this book, is very small indeed: and it is not desirable, without absolute necessity, to alter the received reading. ‘He that loves sincerity, above all things, and is able to deliver his mind in acceptable language, is fit to be a privy-counsellor to a king.’ (Bp. Patrick.)—But “loving pureness of heart,” seems to imply more than loving sincerity, in the common use of the term: and the grace of the lips may denote the wisdom and piety, as well as the eloquence and address, of a man’s discourse. (Marg. Ref.) Thus Pharaoh was won by the wise and pious counsel of Joseph; Ezra, and Nehemiah, rather by their eminent wisdom and piety, than by eloquence and address, were greatly favoured by Artaxerxes; and Mordecai, by Ahasuerus; and Daniel, both by the Chaldean and Persian princes. (Marg. Ref.) In this view, the verse may perhaps be rendered, (for I would speak with great diffidence,) “He that loveth purity of heart! The grace of his lips! the king his friend!” “Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh.” He that is eminently wise, pious, and pure in heart, is an extraordinary character. His wisdom, piety, and integrity, will lead him to give such prudent counsel, so simply and seasonably, that notwithstanding the prejudices of men against true religion, he will not unfrequently be favoured even by kings. They who suppose they have discovered in part the nature and measure of the Hebrew poetry, argue, from the incompleteness of the first clause, against the present reading: but, whatever praise be due to these learned men, it is certainly dangerous to alter the Scriptures on such uncertain grounds. According, however, either to the present reading, or that proposed above, the verse may be thus either explained or accommodated: ‘He who loves pureness of heart, and speaks in a kind and edifying manner, will be found among the friends of the King of heaven.’

V. 12. The watchful care of the Lord preserves the knowledge of himself, and of his truth and will, from being lost in ignorance, idolatry, infidelity, or error; notwithstanding all the machinations of Satan and ungodly men to run it down. The plausible schemes, contained in “the words of transgressors,” are overthrown one after another, and sink into oblivion or contempt: but the truth of God’s word maintains its ground from age to age. Thus it had been observed during many ages, in the days of Solomon: for above 2700 years this proverb has been fulfilling as a prophecy: and it will be verified to future generations, when the words of modern opposers or perverters of Revelation, who now vaunt, as if they were about to carry all before them, shall be overthrown before the Bible, as Dagon before the ark. The marvellous preservation of the Scriptures, in a more correct state than any other book of equal antiquity; though through successive generations it hath been the evident interest of vast numbers to corrupt them, is a manifest proof how “the eyes of the LORD preserve knowledge.” And indeed they are so well preserved, that they little need, and are not likely to receive much good, from conjectural criticism; being capable of an useful and consistent meaning, in almost every part, as they now stand: though doubtless they want immense alterations, to make them consistent with some Creeds; and many complain of obscurity in the book, because their own eyes are blinded that they cannot read it.

V. 13. He derideth them that invent vain excuses, ‘because they would not do their duty.’ Lions seldom are found in the streets of cities or villages. (Marg. Ref.) Some apply this to cowardly magistrates, who dare not punish great and powerful offenders.—‘A worthy magistrate, would meet with such a lion to choose; that he might make God’s ordinance to be revered. He would not more fear to make a worshipful thief, or a right worshipful murderer, (if such a one should come in his circuit,) an example of justice, than to twitch up a poor sheep-stealer.’ (Bp. Sanderson.)

27 If thou hast nothing to pay, ^x why should he take away thy bed from under thee?

‘suffereth the wicked to fall into the acquaintance of an ‘harlot.’ (Marg. Ref.)

V. 15. The child is naturally given to foolishness: but seasonable correction is generally, by the divine blessing, made successful to expel it.

V. 16. Rapacious oppression of the poor, and ostentatious generosity to the rich, often go together: as the one gratifies a man’s avarice, the other his pride. Nay, some fraudulently or violently rob the poor, and then by large presents bribe the rich to connive at their iniquity. But these and similar practices generally bring a secret curse on men’s affairs, which at length reduces them to poverty. Either the expense of their prodigality exceeds the gain of their rapacity; or they are detected and punished for their crimes. Luther renders the verse; ‘He that squeezes the ‘poor to increase his own estate, gives to the rich only to ‘impoverish himself.’ Others will exact from him, what he hath exacted from the poor. The oppressors shall be oppressed and ruined.

V. 17. From this verse to the end of the twenty-fourth chapter, the sacred writer adopts a more connected method; and more directly addressed to the reader; not wholly unlike the introductory part of the book. This, therefore, may be considered as the third part of it. (Notes, ii. 1—9. iv. 1—9. v. 1, 2.)

V. 18. ‘It will give thee most high satisfaction, if ‘thou dost so heartily entertain them, and thoroughly ‘digest them, and faithfully preserve them in mind; that ‘thou art able withal to produce any of them, as there is ‘occasion, and aptly communicate them for other men’s ‘instruction.’ (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 20. (Note, viii. 6—9.) The word rendered excellent, may signify three times, that is, many times. Have I not inculcated these things many times? But some understand it according to another meaning of the same word to signify ‘words fit for a prince to speak, and the best men in ‘the world to hear.’

V. 21. Send thee. Or, ‘are sent to thee,’ to ‘ask a ‘reason of the hope that is in thee;’ or who otherwise request thy counsel. But the clause may mean, ‘That ‘thou mayest be capable of managing business, however ‘difficult, to the satisfaction of those that employ thee.’ The prudent statesman, the sagacious ambassador, and the faithful minister of religion, are characters of this description, each of whom is able to answer, words, even truth, (that is, to give a true and faithful account of his proceedings,) to him that commissioned him.

V. 22, 23. The rich and powerful think that they may oppress the poor and helpless with impunity, either in the ordinary intercourse of life, or in the gate, that is, when acting as magistrates. But that very poverty which encourages their oppression, should deter them from it, not only from motives of compassion: but because God himself is the Patron of the poor, and will surely crush those who crush them, and that even to the life or soul of the oppressor.

V. 24, 25. ‘It highly concerns us for the preserving ‘the peace and safety of our life, that we intermingle not ‘our matters with men of a choleric nature, and such as ‘easily provoke or undertake quarrels and debates. For ‘such kind of friends will perpetually engage us in contentions and factions: so that we shall be constrained either ‘to break off friendship, or to be wanting to our personal ‘safety.’ (Lord Bacon.) Law-suits, duels, and broils of every kind, destructive of comfort, dangerous to life, and wholly inconsistent with religion, are the snares to the soul of those who venture on such intimacies: and it seldom happens, that the quarrelsome humour fails of becoming contagious: so that friends of this character often murder one another.

V. 26, 27. (Note, vi. 1—5.) ‘Solomon here adds, ‘when a man is conscious to himself that he hath no estate, ‘and doth but deceive him to whom he stands bound for ‘the debt: and so deprives him of benefit of the law, ‘mentioned Ex. xxii. 26, 27. Deut. xxiv. 6.’ (Bp. Patrick.) —These laws, however, relate only to pledges, not to insolvent debtors, and least of all to fraudulent debtors. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 28. (Note, Deut. xix. 14.) This verse is generally accommodated, as a caution against 'changing the laws,' which antiquity by grave authority hath delivered, unless 'there be an evident necessity,' and against innovations in general, which can seldom be safely made, and without urgent necessity ought never to be ventured on. If the caution be applied to religious concerns; it must be remembered, that the religion of the Scriptures is of the most venerable antiquity; and all deviations from it, even in the first ages, were innovations. "To the law and to the testimony." If it had been proved, that an Israelite had moved an ancient land-mark, and defrauded his neighbour; the law of God would not have allowed any prescription, by which the new land-mark was to continue to the injury of the honest man's posterity, and the advantage of the robbers. Much less must prescription be admitted against the doctrines, precepts, and ordinances of God. For we know who said, in this case, "Full well ye reject the commandments of God, that ye may keep your own traditions." And we know, that he and his apostles were considered, by these men, as innovators.

V. 29. The words rendered diligent in his business, implies celerity, readiness, and cheerfulness in a man's proper employment, whatever that may be. 'To which is required a quickness of apprehension, in discovering the fittest means, and of dexterity in the application of them: so that the business is not only done, but done speedily, and without much noise and bustle. Such a person, if he can be found, is likely to come to great preferment.' (Bp. Patrick.) On this text, Lord Bacon shows, that profound men are too prying, popular men draw men's eyes too much to themselves: courageous men are apt to be turbulent: and strictly honest men too stiff, to be the most successful courtiers: but celerity in dispatching business hath nothing in it that doth not please. It is, however, of small value, without some of the other qualities. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16.

True wisdom greatly consists in being able to judge accurately of the comparative value of objects, which stand in competition with each other: that we may choose the more excellent, and bestow proportionable care and labour to secure them; and be willing to sacrifice the inferior to the superior interest. The salvation of our souls, a name in the book of life, and the loving favour of the Lord, are the grand concerns of all: but a good name among men is the next most valuable possession. Indeed that reputation, which just passes current in the world, or even in the church, is of small value. The reputation which men obtain by ingenuity, valour, learning, or illustrious actions: or by whatever merely serves to render a man popular, is so often lavished on unworthy characters, and is so ruinous to the vain-glorious idol and his besotted idolaters, that a wise man cannot desire it: nor can it be expected that the world will generally honour those whom God honours. But when a Christian, regardless of his own glory, but zealous for the honour of the Gospel, is enabled to live down prejudice and calumny, and to convince opposers by a uniform course of integrity and discretion; when he so lives, that they who dislike his creed, hesitate not to rely on his veracity and fidelity, even where their interests are most deeply concerned; when he can thus extort the concession from all parties, that he is an honest and friendly man, who would do good to every one: he then has realized a treasure, compared with which gold and silver are baubles. A long life, spent in acquiring such an ascendancy over the minds and consciences of men, is by it well repaid; and the closing scene may produce effects of the most extensive benefit. But this kind of reputation is acquired with great difficulty, and it is easily forfeited; for the higher it is advanced, the more will be expected from the possessor. Nay, it may possibly admit of great abuse: and such is the inconsistency of man, that some have by a long course of good conduct acquired a deservedly high reputation, and then have strangely been induced to give currency to error with it! We should therefore not only be careful to obtain and to preserve a good name: but we should be very circumspect what use we make of that measure which we possess. We are continually reminded, that the rich and the poor will meet together before their common Creator, as their impartial Judge. If then the rich have authority over his poor neighbour, let him use it with gentleness, and without arrogance or contempt: if he lend, or give to him, let him not attempt to domineer over him on that account, remembering that both are upon a level before the Lord. Riches and power are as land to be cultivated: but he who sows iniquity, will reap vanity, and be turned out of his stewardship with disgrace. They who oppress the poor to increase their riches: yea, they who spend that in presents and entertainments for the rich, which was intrusted to them that they might feed the poor, will surely come to want, either here or hereafter. But he, whose eye is looking out continually for necessitous persons to whom he may dispense his bounty, and who gives liberally of his bread to the poor, shall abound in blessings: and the rich have the poor always with them, that whensoever they will, they may do them good, and so obtain these blessings. And let the poor remember, that the Lord made the difference betwixt their lot, and that of the rich: let them then submit to his wise and righteous will, without envy or murmurings: let them be humble, obliging, frugal, and industrious, attending to the duties of their station, and expecting the great decisive day: for "by humility, and the fear of the Lord, are true riches, and honour, and life;" but proud, ungodly, dishonest, and licentious poverty is indeed disgraceful and ruinous. In short, "thorns, and snares are in the path of the froward," whatever be his rank in life: he must be pierced with sorrows, and entangled in temptations, from which he that keepeth his soul shall be far removed. The scorner, for instance, must be excluded from every orderly family, and all instructive company, in order that strife and contention may go out, and peace may be preserved. Thus he is driven to associate with those who are pests of society, and to sink deeper into sin and misery continually. And if he be not fit for those families, which have some feeble resemblance of the regions of peace and love, he will never find admission into heaven ; but must remain in outer darkness and despair. It is indeed desirable to live, as much as may be, like the blessed company above, where strife and envy never find admission : and that our families also may be peaceful and orderly, we should very carefully train up our children in the way in which they should go : that as they grow up, they may set an example of obedience to domestics, as well as give a hopeful prospect of living pious and useful lives. For every kind of foolishness and vice is bound up in the heart of a child, and will be unfolded by years, temptations, and opportunities : but the discreet use of the rod of correction has a powerful tendency to check its growth ; and, when used in obedience to God, and dependance on him, is an appointed means of driving it away : so that generally they, who are properly educated, when they grow old do not depart from the way in which they were trained up. But humoured and neglected children soon contract habits of sloth : every exertion or difficulty dismays them, as if a lion were in their path ready to devour them ; and thus abject and useless poverty comes upon them. Again ill-instructed youths seldom escape that deep pit, which swallows up the abhorred of the LORD. They are lazy and loitering, and come within the flattering speech of the strange woman, who decoys them into the most ruinous courses ; from which a prudent and pious education is the best preservative. The prudent man, foreseeing these and similar evils, to which he or his children are exposed even in this world, will take proper precautions against them : “ but the simple pass on, and are punished.” Let us then be very thankful, that the good providence of God hath preserved to us these words of knowledge, during so long a course of years ; while numerous systems of vain philosophy have sunk into oblivion, and the words of more atrocious transgressors have perished : and let us seek to have our hearts purified by faith, and our words seasoned by grace ; and then, whatever be our outward condition, the King of kings will be our everlasting Friend.

V. 17—29.

How important is it, that we bow down our ears, and apply our hearts to knowledge ! For if we keep these instructions within us, they will be a source of constant pleasure to us ; and we shall learn to fit them to our lips, and to speak of them with constancy to others, when we practise them ourselves. Indeed these are excellent things in counsel and knowledge, which show us the certainty of divine truths, and how to answer all who inquire after them or object to them. And we should, after the example of the wise man, try every method of gaining the attention, and impressing the hearts of others with them.—How often are we warned against oppressing the poor and needy ! and after all that Christianity has effected ; and all that equitable laws and impartial judges can do, in those few places where they are found, these warnings are by no means superfluous. But let it be remembered, that he who robs the poor, especially under colour of law, rouses the dormant vengeance of the righteous and merciful God, who makes their cause his own. A great deal of the comfort, safety, and happiness of life, depends on our choice of friends : we should then especially avoid the furious and contentious man, if we value our lives and souls ; and such as would draw us in to engage for more than we are worth, to the defrauding of creditors, and our own utter ruin.—Habits of industry, and expert activity in business, formed in youth, when connected with integrity and propriety of conduct, are of great importance ; for they do more towards a man's comfort and credit even in this world, than large inheritances or splendid talents can do. But after all, this world is of little value. All other distinctions will soon be swallowed up in that grand one, which subsists betwixt those who trust in the Lord, and those that do not. We may come short of wealth, or reputation and the friendship of great men, but the King of heaven will guard, and bless, and honour all who trust in him ; whilst he reserves the wicked to the day of judgment to be punished. Let us then be diligent in his work : and though we live and die among mean men, we shall at length be numbered with the princes of his people, and stand with acceptance before the King of glory.

ous there than elsewhere. Persons of inferior rank are seldom admitted to such tables, but upon particular occasions; and their behaviour will be narrowly observed, especially if they profess religion, or are public teachers. Indulgence of the appetite frequently betrays into impropriety of conduct, which excites resentment, or renders the superior less friendly. It must lessen a man's character to be delighted with an opportunity of self-indulgence: he appears to covet that abundance which he does not possess: he sanctions the excesses and carnal pleasures of ungodly men, which his example at least should protest against; and it weakens his influence, and deprives him of opportunities of usefulness, which are too valuable to be sold at so contemptible a price. A man should therefore consider diligently what and who is before him, and what consequences his conduct may produce: and if he knows himself liable to be overcome by his appetite, he should double his guard; and act as if a knife were at his throat, to give him a mortal wound if he yielded to the temptation: that is, he should dread such unseemly behaviour worse than even death. He should learn to be indifferent about deceitful meat; which promises pleasure; but produces painful effects to the health, character, interests, and conscience. 'For oft times the rich, when they bid their inferiors to their tables, it is not for the love they bear them, but for their own secret purposes.' The words rendered given to appetite, may mean, possession of thy soul, that is, if thou hast thy wits about thee.

V. 4, 5. The wisdom of the world consists in labouring to be rich; and in contriving every plan, without being over scrupulous, and giving all diligence, to get forward in this grand concern: for prodigality and other vices, inconsistent with growing rich, are considered as a man's folly. The wise man therefore not only exhorts the reader to cease from his own folly, but from his own wisdom; and not to weary himself, about acquiring wealth: but to subordinate all his worldly interests and pursuits to the acquisition of wisdom and piety; and thus to lay up more certain and valuable treasures. For why should a man let his eyes and heart eagerly pursue an empty fleeting shadow; especially when substantial good is within his reach? Yet riches are such an empty, fleeting shadow, which the covetous man watches and broods over, till at length they form themselves, as it were, wings, and fly away, quite out of his reach, as the eagle flies towards heaven.

V. 6-8. Many make a show of entertaining their acquaintance, who sordidly grudge the expense, and often betray symptoms of this penuriousness. A wise man would not be under obligations to persons of so base and insincere a character: for though their words be friendly and their entertainment good, there is no cordial welcome; and in their hearts they are best pleased with those who decline their invitations. It is enough to make a man loath every morsel that he hath eaten at the expense of such persons, and to wish they had it again: and he cannot but be ashamed and grieved to reflect, that he wasted his sweet words in complimenting, flattering, or even thanking those who so little deserve it. The word rendered lose, equally means corrupt; and may intimate the temptation to which the guest of a churl is exposed, of deviating from sincerity and piety in his conversation, to avoid giving offence.

V. 9. (Note, ix. 7, 8. Marg. Ref.) This maxim implies speaking on important subjects, in the hearing of a foolish and wicked man, who will do all he can to expose them to ridicule and contempt. (Ps. xxxix. 1.)

V. 10, 11. (Notes, xxii. 22, 23. 28.) The Redeemer was the next of kin, who was authorized, and required, and even bound in interest, to see that his poor relations were not oppressed or defrauded, (Note, Lev. xxv;) and who was the avenger of blood in case they were murdered. The Redeemer of orphans and widows, in this case, might be so poor and helpless, that a rich and powerful oppressor would despise and defy him: but let it be well attended to, that the almighty God is the Redeemer of the fatherless, and will defend their cause against all who injure them. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12. (Marg. Ref.) 'Do not turn over this business to another; but do it thyself, which may save the public officers the labour: nay, by making his body smart for his faults, both body and soul may be delivered from utter destruction.' (Bp. Patrick.) The word is Sheol, which doubtless means here more than the grave.

V. 13, 14. These verses may imply a caution not to correct children in an improper manner, as well as an admonition not to withhold correction from them. They, who strike children in a passion, often use improper weapons, and risk material evil consequences: and this abuse has tended to discredit wholesome and scriptural correction. But the use of the rod, though it pains the child, (and the tender parent perhaps still more,) will be sure not to kill him, and is calculated to deliver his soul from hell.

V. 15, 16. Some interpret these verses as the language of a wise and pious parent; who conscientiously corrects his child, and at the same time affectionately argues with him, and shows him that he hath nothing in view except his good, which would give the tender parent an inexpressible satisfaction; especially if the child were not only kept from evil ways, but enabled to be useful, by pious conversation, prudence, and upright counsel, to others also. This is a very interesting and instructive application of the passage, and well worthy the attention of parents. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 17, 18. When we habitually act with an awful sense of God in our minds, as in his presence, and according to his commands, seeking to please him, and expecting help and happiness from him: then we are "in the fear of the Lord all the day long." And such persons have no need to envy prosperous sinners: for the end of their trials and of the sinner's prosperity is at hand; and the believer's expectation shall not be cut off or perish in disappointment. it, often costs much; not only much labour, but loss of property, friends, character, liberty, and even life; yet it cannot be bought too dear. We should determine to make the truth our own, though it cost us our lives: and not to sell it at any price. Christ is this truth. Many, like the rich young man, Herod, Felix, and Agrippa, will not go to the price of becoming his true disciples: and many, after professing themselves his disciples, like Demas, forsake him, and sell the truth, loving this present world.—But true Christians count all but loss, for the excellency of the knowledge of him.

V. 24, 25. 'There is no greater joy a parent can have, than to see his son take virtuous courses. Let not thy father and mother then want this singular pleasure: but by thy well-doing fill the heart of her that bare thee with joy and triumph, who for all the pains and care, that she hath had in thy birth, and about thy education, desires no other requital, but only this.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 26. 'Give thyself wholly to wisdom.' If this verse be considered, merely as the words of Solomon to his son, or to the reader, it means no more than an affectionate call for earnest attention to instruction, and especially to the subsequent important caution. But in these chapters, Wisdom, (that is, Christ, the Word and Wisdom of God,) seems to address the reader, as at the beginning of the book; and on that supposition, this verse is a call of Christ to every reader, to give him his heart. The law demands love to God with the whole heart and soul; but sin and the world have possession of it in fallen creatures: and the express design of the Gospel is to bring us, by repentance and faith, to give our hearts to the Saviour and to God through him; that he may there set up his kingdom, write his law, and reign the undisputed Lord of all our affections. And unless this call be obeyed, all else will be decidedly rejected.

V. 27, 28. (Note, xxii. 14. Marg. Ref.) "A narrow pit," out of which it is extremely difficult to escape. (Notes, ii. v.—vii.)—"Such are her arts, notwithstanding

V. 30. ‘They that are the last at the wine.’ ‘He that sits long at the wine, that hunts about from one tavern to another, where he may find the most exquisite wine.’

V. 34, 35. The perils to which drunken men expose themselves, are as imminent as if they lay down to sleep upon the unstable waves of the sea, or upon the top of the ship’s mast in a storm. A drunken man may be beaten and bruised, and not be sensible of it at the time; but he will feel it severely afterwards: yet so inveterate are his habits, and so great his infatuation; that as soon as he has, with difficulty, shaken off the drowsiness of the last night’s debauch, he is determined to seek it yet again. No loss, pain, sickness, poverty, ill-treatment, dangers, or deliverances, can prevail with him so much as, sincerely and constantly, to desire to break his chain.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—18.

How good are all the laws and counsels of the Lord! His prohibitions only say to us, “Do thyself no harm.” He “giveth us all things richly to enjoy,” as far as it is good for us; and then enters his paternal caveat against our disgracing, or ruining ourselves, by excess. He requires his rational creatures to be the lords, and not the slaves, of their animal appetites: and how mean and senseless is it, to rush upon indulgence, when the honour of God, the good of our neighbour, and our own advantage, concur in laying the appetite under a temporary interdict! Such is the law in all its strictness; and its goodness renders the transgression of it inexcusable. But the Gospel alone encourages us with the assurance of pardon and effectual grace: and through the motives, encouragements, and aids thus proposed to us, we may cheerfully hearken to the instructions of wisdom, and hope practically to derive benefit from them. Let us then apply our hearts unto instruction, and “our ears unto the words of knowledge.” Thus we shall learn to avoid every inexpedient indulgence, and to be of his mind, who “would eat no flesh whilst the world stood, rather than cause his weak brother to offend.” We shall consider times and circumstances; where we are, and what is before us, and what impression our conduct may make, or what effects it may produce, upon others: we shall place the strongest guard on the weakest side, and when we most feel our weakness, we shall shun temptation, or be doubly earnest in prayer to overcome it: we shall not allow a desire after the delicacies which we find to be ensnaring to our souls; and shall endeavour most to practise abstemiousness, where incentives to excess most abound. He, who is thus instructed, will feel little inclination to come to the table of a selfish man, however well it is spread, or however pressingly he is invited. For what should he do there? Edifying conversation would be thrown away; and it would be worse than a waste of words, to speak sweet language to a man, whom he cannot but regard with a mixture of pity and contempt. He who hears the words of Christ, will beware also of covetousness. In his honest industry he will aim to do his duty, but will not “labour to be rich;” he will not set his eyes, or his heart, on such fleeting treasures, knowing how speedily and certainly a separation must take place. For he whose treasures are left on earth, and whose soul is in hell, will find that he coveted what was not; that his wealth was a phantom, but his crimes a reality. Who then, that is wise, would remove the old land-mark, or take possession of the estate of the fatherless, or get wealth by injustice or oppression of the poor? For their Redeemer is mighty, (though he became poor, that he might be their Brother and Redeemer;) and he will plead their cause with those that wrong them. But if any are resolved to grow rich by such means, we must let them alone: the covetous Pharisees derided even Christ, when he warned them to be faithful in the unrighteous mammon: and he bids us not to speak in the ears “of a fool, for he will despise the wisdom of our words.”

CHAP. XXIV.

Cautions against envy, discontent, sinful thoughts, neglect of doing good, rejoicing over an enemy's calamity, respect of persons, flattery, revenge, and sloth; recommendations of the knowledge and fear of God, and obedience to the king;

But surely we shall not envy sinners; let us but live conscientiously in the fear of God all the day long, and wait for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life: and when the end cometh, and our expectations are fully answered, we shall find that true godliness is great gain. As the Lord commands us, with a solemn introduction, not to withhold correction from our children, but to beat them with the rod to save their souls from destruction: so we may expect, that he will correct us for our good, if we are the objects of his special love. Let us then take affliction in good part, and seek to have it sanctified, that we "may be partakers of his holiness." Thus our teachers will rejoice on our account; nay, the Lord himself will "rejoice over us to do us good;" and, obeying his commands and copying his example, in educating our children, we may hope to enjoy with thankful exulting hearts the highest satisfaction that can be derived from outward things, while we witness their pious, wise, and useful conduct, in the situations which Providence shall allot them; and may cheerfully leave the world, assured that the best part of all we knew, spoke, or did, will survive us, and through them be made useful to the next generation.

V. 19—35.

The gracious Saviour, who purchased for his people pardon and peace, with all the affection of a kind preceptor, yea, of a tender parent, counsels us to "hear and be wise, and to guide our hearts in his ways:" and at the same time he is ready to assist us in obeying every one of his injunctions. "Be not," says he, "amongst wine-bibbers, amongst riotous eaters of flesh: for the drunk-ard and the glutton shall come to poverty," and the "drowsiness," which such excess occasions, "will clothe a man with rags." Mark, says he, and learn wisdom by the painful experience of other men: Who has more misery and sorrow than his neighbours? Who is always engaged in riots, fightings, or law-suits? Who renders himself despised or hated by his babblings? Who is frequently covered with bruises, or is laid up with dangerous wounds, when neither called to defend himself, nor his friends, nor his country? Who carries the marks of his dis-tempered body, in the redness of his eyes, and in his bloated countenance? Do you not see that these are the wretched appendages of those "that tarry long at the wine, that go to seek mixed wine?" Do you envy their advantages? or do you wish to be exempted from such miseries? If you desire the latter, then beware of contracting the habit of drinking beyond the bounds of strict temperance. The wine may sparkle in the glass, and appear beautiful to the eye, and drunken poets may write very ingenious things and declarations of the safety of the righteous, 1—34.

BE^a not thou envious against evil men,
 B^b neither desire to be with them.

2 For^c their heart studieth destruction, and their lips talk of mischief.

in praise of it: it may also please the palate, and exhilarate the mind for a moment; but at "the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder." Whatever exceeds exact sobriety, is poisoned: it is far worse than the fabled cup of Circe, which transformed men into brutes; for it inflames the passions, and fits them for every hateful crime: it ruins a man's constitution and character, and tends to beggar his family: it is an incentive to the basest lusts, and causes many to fall into that deep ditch and narrow pit, from which so few escape with their lives; making them an easy prey to those bad women who lie in wait for them, and whose constant employment it is, to increase the transgressors amongst men: it looses the tongue to utter every thing impious, polluting, and provoking: it leads a man, without precaution, to run himself into unnumbered dangers; and yet it fascinates him into such a love for his cruel oppressor and his galling chains, that he only sleeps to recruit himself, that when he awakes he may return to his destructive indulgence! Who then, that has common sense, would contract such a habit, or sell himself to an iniquity, which tends to such accumulated guilt and misery, and exposes a man every day to the danger of dying intoxicated and awaking in hell? Thus the Wisdom and Word of God warns men against this common but fatal vice: and He exhorts young persons to notice the admonitions of their parents to this effect: "Hearken," says he, "unto thy father, that begat thee, and despise not thy mother when she is old." Their counsel is salutary, their authority from God, the child's obligations are great; and the guilt of those that despise their aged parents is exceedingly heinous. And it should be the aim and honest ambition of every young person to be the joy, comfort, and honour of his aged father and mother, in their declining years. But the Saviour himself addresses us as children, and says, "My son, give me thy heart; and let thine eyes observe my ways:" and if we desire to be wise and happy, we should surrender them to him, and he will prepare them for himself, and make them a treasury of wisdom and grace, that from that abundance we may speak and do what is right and good. Thus his salvation is freely bestowed upon us: yet we must "buy the truth," we must spare no cost or pains, and sacrifice every lust and interest, that we may purchase this inestimable prize. On the other hand, we must refuse to give up, or to act inconsistently with, our religious profession, or to relinquish the pursuit of wisdom; even if we could be tempted to it by the offer of all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them. And what part soever of our conduct we may at any time be sorry for, we shall not, when the end comes, repent of following this counsel, even though we should lose our lives, rather than deviate from it.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIV. V. 1, 2. (Notes, 1. 10—19. iii. 31, 32. Marg. Ref.)

V. 3—6. Some render the first two of these verses thus: 'Let thy house be built in wisdom, and let it be 'established with understanding; and the chambers will 'be filled by knowledge with all precious and pleasant
'riches.' The original is future: a counsel rather than an affirmation,—Dishonesty in many cases seems the readiest road to wealth; but prudence and piety lead the surest way to durable prosperity. A wise, upright, and pious person, is most likely to advance and establish himself and family, in a comfortable and respectable situation; and to obtain that plenty which conduces to the real enjoyment of life, and enables a man to do good; and his sober, discreet, and charitable use of it, renders it precious and pleasant. His wisdom also will prove a greater security to him, and give him a greater ascendancy over others, than mere power and authority could do: by knowledge he increases his strength: and when such a wise man is placed upon the throne, he will so conduct himself, as to avoid contests if he can; and if he cannot, he will take such good counsel in waging war, that he will provide well for the safety of himself and of the state; even though he have to cope with an antagonist far more powerful than himself. (Notes, xi. 14. xv. 22. xx. 18.)

V. 7. (Note, xv. 24.) The careless, sensual, and selfish man, is the fool here spoken of. Wisdom is out of his reach; he is of too low and grovelling a disposition to raise his thoughts to so noble an object, or to bestow the pains which are requisite in order to obtain it. (Note, Ps. xcii.
6, 7.) He openeth not his mouth in the convention of the elders, to consult about public concerns: not because he is too modest to speak his thoughts; but because he hath nothing to say; and because he little cares how matters go with others, or even with his own soul; provided he may be unmolested in his worthless pursuits and gratifica-tions! or, because he is rash and headstrong, he is not admitted to speak on such occasions.

V. 8, 9. 'He that deviseth new ways and arts of 'cheating, or doing mischief, shall be branded with the 'odious name of, "An inventor of evil things." (Rom.

i. 30. Bp. Patrick.) He, who deviseth mischief, will be adjudged a mischievous man, even though he do not effect his purpose. The thought, intention, or desire, to commit any kind of vice, nay, the very harbouring the idea in the imagination, or admitting it without abhorrence, is sin: but he who not only devises evil, but scoffs at the precepts and warnings of God's word, ought to be abhorred, and will become abominable to men, as he is an abomination among them.

V. 10. 'Man has no trial of his strength, till he be in 'troubles.' When afflictions depress a man's spirits, and unfit him for present duty, and lead him to neglect it; it is manifest that his faith and grace are weak, and consequently he is wanting in vigour and courage.

V. 11, 12. If any man knows that his neighbour is in danger of losing his life, by false accusation, or a malicious prosecution, or in any other way; he is bound to do all in his power to deliver him. But if self-love, indolence, cowardice, or reluctance to incur expense or inconvenience, induce him to remain quiet, he will be deemed an accessary to the crime: and it will be in vain for him to say that he was not fully acquainted with the matter, or aware of the danger, that it was none of his business, and he knew not how to prevent it; for the Lord seeth through, and will expose, such fallacious excuses. 'This chiefly 'belongs to magistrates, who ought not to be over-awed
'by great men, from undertaking the protection and relief
'of those who are unjustly oppressed.' (Bp. Patrick.)
Many of the proverbs, no doubt, were particularly intended for the instruction and warning of rulers; who may be supposed likely to notice the maxims of a great king, more than those of inferior men: but there is generally an important meaning, in which each proverb is applicable to the case of every reader. 'The magistrate ought to be 'the guardian of innocent men's lives: and private per'sons, in their places, ought to oppose, without sedition, 'unjust severity, as much as they are able. There are 'many examples of this in Scripture. Jonathan opposed
'his father, and helped to preserve David. Obadiah fed
'the prophets whom Jezebel designed to have killed. The 'eunuch pulled up Jeremiah out of the dungeon: and the 'midwives saved the Israelites' children; as Rahab

‘afterwards did the spies.’ ‘Examples to the contrary, are such as that of Doeg, who in compliance with Saul’s ‘fury, slew the innocent priests.’ (Melancthon.) He might have included all the courtiers and officers of Saul, who allowed such an impious and unrighteous cruelty to be perpetrated without resistance, or even remonstrance, except that of the footmen or guards who bravely refused to obey the murderous orders of their Sovereign, choosing to obey God rather than man; and who set a noble example worthy of imitation by persons in similar circumstances, to the end of time.

V. 13, 14. Men eat the honey from the comb, because it is pleasant to the taste, at the same time that it is wholesome and nutrimental. So is the knowledge of divine wisdom to those who have begun to acquire it. Their relish for it will increase with their progress in it; their present pleasure is the earnest of their future and certain recompense. Does a man eat honey because it is pleasant and wholesome? Let him seek knowledge for the same reason, and he will find it far more pleasant and profitable. (Note, xxii. 17, 18.)

V. 15, 16. Let no wicked man presume, through the arrogance of prosperity, to plot secretly, or to attack openly, the mean and unprotected residence of the righteous; as this will only end in his own ruin. For though the righteous may fall into many calamities, yet he shall recover from them all; but the wicked will shortly fall into absolute misery, to rise no more. ‘These words are commonly, not only in sermons, but in books, applied to falling into sin: and that men may the more securely indulge themselves in sin, and yet think themselves good men, they have cunningly added something to them. For they are commonly cited thus, “A just man falleth seven times a day;” which last words are not in any translation, (much less in the original,) but only in some corrupt editions of the vulgar Latin. And therefore we must make use of other places, for the confuting the ‘fancy of perfection in this life; and the comfort of those who are cast down by their lapses into sin: and take heed of reading the Holy Scripture so carelessly, as to turn our medicine into poison; which is the fault of those who, from such mistakes, give way to their evil affections, and let them carry them into sin.’ (*Bp. trick.) This is an important note: for nothing does more mischief, than applying texts of Scripture, merely by the sound of the words, to subjects with which they have no connexion. There are plain texts enough to prove every scriptural doctrine, and to answer every scriptural purpose: but pressing texts into any particular service, contrary to their plain meaning, (as in this case,) not only serves to deceive the inconsiderate; but likewise to rivet the prejudices, and strengthen the suspicions of opposers: just as bringing forward a number of suspected witnesses, in any important cause, after a sufficient number of creditable witnesses had been examined; would make the judge, and jury, and audience, suspect even the good witnesses, and would create a prejudice against the cause itself, which needed to be thus supported.

V. 17, 18. These verses are a caution, not only against outwardly exulting over the miseries of an enemy, (which is not generally creditable even in this evil world;) but also against being secretly pleased at them. To this our selfish nature is peculiarly prone: but it is totally contrary to the law of God. “Thou shalt love thy neighbour as ‘thyself;’ as every one feels when he is the insulted sufferer. Even the secret indulgence of such a malignant joy, being known to God, might induce him to turn away his wrath from the afflicted party, and lay it on him who rejoiced in the calamity. (Note, xvii. 5.) Such proverbs are perfectly coincident with the precepts of the New Testament; and all the passages in the psalms, or elsewhere, which seem to breathe a contrary spirit, must have a meaning consistent with them: even as the exultations of the martyrs, &c. in Revelation, over the destruction of their persecutors (Rev. xvii. 5-7. xviii. 20.) must be capable of an interpretation which accords to the precepts of our Saviour’s sermon on the mount. But to rejoice in the triumphs of the cause of God and his church, of truth and holiness, over the desperate enemies of all good, is widely different from the spirit of revenge for personal injuries.

V. 19, 20. (Note, Ps. xxxvii. 1, 2.) “Be not angry because of evil men,” &c. The word translated reward, is generally rendered latter end, or end, (xxiii. 18.) “There shall be no end of plagues to the evil man; the light of the wicked shall be put out.” (Old Translation.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 21, 22. 'Have nothing to do with those, who vary from all good laws and orders, and are affected to innovation and change, both of princes and government.' (Bp. Hall.) Kings and rulers must be revered and obeyed, in all things lawful, by all who fear God, and obey his commands. (Marg. Ref.) The late events, for a series of years in Europe, have abundantly shown, that Solomon's wisdom was far greater than that of modern philosophers, so called; or rather, that the wisdom of God is infinitely above the wisdom of man. The ruin of those who rebel against God, and of those who excite disturbances in the state, comes upon them in the most unsuspected manner, and is dreadful beyond conception. (Note, xvii. 11.)

V. 23. The following things should be peculiarly considered by all, that would act as wise men, especially in the capacity of rulers and magistrates. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 24, 25. The magistrate, who acquits a wicked man, or decides in his favour because of his wealth or power, will be generally and justly execrated: but they who restrain and punish evil-doers of every rank, will have the satisfaction of being generally favoured, and the advantage of having many prayers offered for them, and blessings pronounced on them. Those authors, or orators, who compose panegyrics on wicked men; those courtiers and dependents who flatter ungodly princes and nobles; and above all, those ministers who, through fear, sloth, ignorance, or love of filthy lucre, give that encouragement to wicked men which belongs only to the righteous, are by parity of reason included, and will be at length universally execrated: whilst they who act faithfully, will have the comfort and benefit of it.

V. 26. He who speaks honestly, faithfully, seasonably, and to the purpose, whether as a judge, a witness, a senator, a counsellor, a minister, or a private person, will meet with general respect and affection. At least this ought to be the case; and every one who experiences the benefit of the right answer, will be attached to him that gave it.

V. 27. The most needful and profitable work should be first attended to. Men ought to employ their labour and expense in cultivating the land, before they proceed to build and beautify their houses, or furnish them in an elegant style. For if the house be built, and the land be neglected, another man will be likely to possess both of them. Or the proverb may mean, that every thing should be done with deliberation, foresight, and contrivance: 'Get all ready, as well as count the cost, before you begin to build.'

V. 28. "Be not thou a witness against thy neighbour without cause: for wilt thou deceive with thy lips?" (Old Translation.) The expression without cause, seems to imply not only the case of a man who bears false witness, but that of him who, from personal resentment, or any other corrupt motive, testifies the truth against his neighbour, when there is no sufficient reason why he should do it; when neither the glory of God, nor the benefit of man requires it.

V. 29. (Marg. Ref.) 'He showeth what is in the nature of the wicked; to revenge wrong for wrong.'

V. 30-34. (Note, vi. 6-11.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-20.

The strong propensity in human nature to malignant and selfish tempers renders repeated cautions against them necessary. But it must be as foolish as it is wicked, to "be envious against evil men, or to desire" a share in their unlawful gains; whilst "their heart studieth destruction," and their lips talk of mischief: or to fret or distress ourselves at their short-lived success, in "laying wait against the dwelling of the righteous, and spoiling his resting-place:" for unless they repent they will soon fall into mischief to rise no more; and their wasting candle

Of kings, and those who minister to them, 1—7. Of avoiding contention, and receiving reproof, 8—12. Of faithful messengers, and vain boasters, 13, 14. Of forbearance, temperance, and prudent conduct towards neighbours, 15—17. Of false witnesses, unfaithful friends and unseasonable mirth, 18—20. Of kindness to enemies, frowning away backbiters, and domestic discord, 21—24. Of the righteous falling before the wicked; of vain glory and an ungoverned temper, 25—28.

will expire in "the blackness of darkness for ever." But the righteous man, though repeatedly cast down into trouble, nay, should he be again and again overcome with strong temptations, shall rise superior to them all, and have an eternal dwelling and resting-place, which the wicked cannot approach. We may foresee, but we should not desire, the destruction of sinners: neither may we rejoice when our enemy falleth. Even when we are greatly injured, and sharply persecuted, we must not indulge such emotions of revenge: for the Lord will see it and be displeased; he will even suffer the haughty persecutor to proceed a little longer with impunity, rather than allow his people to harbour in any measure so malignant a spirit; and instead of punishing their persecutors, he will previously and sharply chastise them, to prepare them to meet deliverance in a more Christian manner. How displeasing then must that revenge be, which is generally excited by trivial or imaginary offences, and puts men upon evident crimes, in order to retaliate on the offender! We are here again reminded of the value of true wisdom; which alone can give a man establishment in that kind of reputation and prosperity that is precious and desirable: for it will suggest to him the most beneficent designs, and afford him the greatest advantages for accomplishing them; and it will do more than all other things to render him safe and useful. But this wisdom is far too high and arduous a thing for the giddy and heedless part of mankind, who waste their lives in low pursuits or childish amusements. They only obtain this invaluable good, who bestow pains to obtain it; who are taught so to prize it for the sake of its effects, that they would pursue it, if it were with present pain and uneasiness; and they find such sweetness in it, that they would feed upon it, as men do on the purest honey, even if there were no future advantage from it. But the recompense is sure to those who thus seek wisdom from the Lord; and its present usefulness is immense. Whilst foolish and wicked men either do not open their mouths in the gate; or, intruding into offices for which they are not qualified, only "darken counsel by words without knowledge;" wisdom renders a man fit for his station in the community, whatever it be. So that should he even be called to fill a throne, he will conduct public affairs with discretion, and benefit by the multitude of counsellors: and he will repress, and be a terror to evil doers alone. He will count it his highest honour to promote the happiness of his people; he will engage in no war, but for their protection and true interest; and his prudent conduct will do far more to secure success, and to strengthen the nation, and procure a safe and lasting peace, than any of those heroical achievements, which are so highly celebrated in the world. We should never forget that our heart-searching God will call us to account for the devices and thoughts of our heart. Instead therefore of inventing evil things with the mischievous person, or entertaining our minds with vain and sinful thoughts; we ought continually to be looking around us, to see what good we can do, or what mischief we can prevent: and we need not wait long for opportunities, if we be "zealous of good works." For if our neighbour, or even our enemy, be in danger of being ruined, condemned, or deeply injured, through malice or mistake, we are bound to risk every personal consequence for his deliverance. In such things, however, the deceitfulness of the heart must be peculiarly guarded against. For self-love suggests many plausible excuses, and the conscience may be bribed to bring in a favourable verdict: but the Lord will order a rehearing of the cause; he will manifest the secrets of all hearts, and render unto every man according to his works: and if he find our excuses insufficient, and the effect of indolence, cowardice, self-indulgence, and unbelief, we shall be considered as chargeable with a share of that guilt which we might have successfully opposed; and as having concurred in causing that misery which we ought to have prevented. But the same feebleness of mind which causes many to faint in the day of adversity, induces numbers to shrink from such services, as cannot be performed without giving offence to powerful oppressors; or to those of lower rank, who will not relieve the urgent necessities of the poor themselves, and then take it as a reflection upon them if others supply their deficiencies. This timid indolent spirit is often mistaken for meekness: but it is in fact a natural disposition, which as much needs correcting by divine grace, as the impetuous violence of self-sufficient courage does. We should therefore pray continually for the courage of faith, and the meekness of humility, and the persevering, enduring activity of fervent love.

V. 21—34.

"These things belong unto the wise:" and "if any man lack wisdom let him ask of God." But that wisdom which he bestows will never suffer a man to say, "I will do so to him, as he hath done to me, I will render unto him according to his work." For in this spirit, the most exact evidence, which could be given even in a court of justice, would be criminal before God. On such occasions we should be afraid of officiousness, or of wrong motives, in being witness against our neighbour without a cause: but resentment generally warps the judgment, induces a man to make the worst of every circumstance, and thus leads him to deceive with his lips, and to become a slanderer and false accuser. In like manner, "the wisdom

“which is from above,” will effectually prevent the magistrate from “respecting persons in judgment;” and both the magistrate, and minister of religion; and every person, from saying “to the wicked, thou art righteous.” When this is done by the magistrate, “the people will curse him, “nations will abhor him:” and though the minister, who flatters and deceives men’s souls, may here be caressed and prospered, he will hereafter be more deeply and universally execrated than any other person in the world. But he who rebukes and reproves with affectionate faithfulness, whatever return he may have from men, shall have delight in the testimony of his conscience, in the good done by him, and in the favour of his God, and “a good blessing will “come upon him.” In general, even here, he who studies to adapt his discourse to every case in which he is required to speak, will find a measure of respect and attention; for “every man will kiss his lips, who giveth a right answer,” and such as he derives good from. But sloth and self-indulgence are the bane of all good. Whilst we go past “the field of the slothful, and the vineyard of the “man void of understanding,” and view them overgrown with thorns and nettles, and the fences all broken down: we see an emblem of the far more deplorable state of many souls. Every vile affection grows exceedingly in the hearts of vast multitudes, all their faculties are thrown open to the delusions or suggestions of the devil and his agents; nothing good has any root or growth there, and everlasting poverty is coming upon them as an armed man: yet they are saying, “a little sleep, a little slumber, a “little folding of the hands to sleep!” A wise man will consider and receive instruction from the ruinous misconduct of a fool: though the fool will not profit by the example or counsel of a wise man. Let us then show our wisdom, by taking the hint from the case of the sluggard, to redouble our diligence in every good thing, and to watch and pray more against the beginnings of so ruinous a vice. But many who are diligent in worldly business, are slothful about their eternal interests. They mind minute concerns, but neglect the momentous: they embellish the house, but neglect the estate! Let us then learn to begin at the right end; and to do every thing in season, and in order, and with prudence as well as diligence. And let us “study to be quiet, and to mind our own business,” conscientiously and in the fear of God: let us honour and obey the king, and have nothing to do with those turbulent spirits who are given to change, and always aiming to raise disturbances and introduce innovations: thus we shall avoid the calamity, and the ruin which come suddenly upon those who rebel against God and the king; and shall so “pass through things temporal, as finally to obtain “the things which are eternal.”

NOTES.

CHAP. XXV. V. 1. Men, &c. “The men whom ‘Hezekiah appointed for that purpose.’ ‘The friends of ‘Hezekiah.’ (Sept.) It is probable that Solomon himself, or some others, by his order and under his inspection, had selected the proverbs contained in the preceding chapters, as most suited to general religious utility: but that all the rest of the three thousand were preserved by the kings of Israel, though not published for the use of the people; and that Hezekiah, with the concurrence, and under the superintendence, of Isaiah, and other contemporary prophets, employed some competent persons among his servants, to collect from the rest the proverbs contained in this and the following chapters.

V. 2, 3. It is the glory of God, that he knoweth all things most perfectly, and that he needeth no information or counsel; that he giveth no account of his matters, and concealeth his purposes from the most penetrating and intruding, except as he has unfolded some particulars of what he intended to do in future ages, to confirm his revelation of himself, and his truth and will, for men’s encouragement and instruction in their duty. But earthly princes are in themselves as ignorant and fallible as their subjects: their honour therefore consists in investigating every matter with the utmost accuracy and attention. It behooves them to search out the revealed will of God; and to procure intelligence from every quarter, and information on every subject connected with their important duties; and to avail themselves of the wisdom of others, whom they advise with as counsellors: that their laws, decisions, and measures, may be the result of knowledge, equity, sound policy, and mature deliberation, and conducive to the true interests of their subjects; and not the dictates of pride, ambition, resentment, passion, or caprice. Yet a wise king will be upon the reserve, as to his determinations, till the event discovers them: and it will often be as impracticable for others to drive into his secret intentions, as to measure the height of the heaven, or the depth of the earth.— ‘Men cannot attain to the reason of all the secret doings ‘of a king, even when he is upright and doeth his duty.’

V. 4, 5. As the artificer cannot make a beautiful cup or vessel without well refining his metal; so a king cannot establish his throne in righteousness, till he remove wicked men from places of public trust, and drive them from his counsel and from about his person. ‘They should ‘not keep so much as one ill man about them; who oftentimes corrupts the whole court, and disturbs the whole ‘kingdom.’ (Bp. Patrick.) The modern maxim, that the private character of a minister of state should not be investigated, flatly contradicts the wisdom of Solomon and of God.

V. 6, 7. (Note, Luke xiv. 7-11.) There can be no reasonable doubt but that our Lord referred to these verses, in his admonition to the ambitious guests at the Pharisee's table, and was understood to do so. While, therefore, this gives his sanction to the book of Proverbs, it also shows, that these maxims may fairly be applied to similar cases, and that we need not confine the interpretation exclusively to the subject which gave rise to the maxim. The ambitious competition of courtiers, the disgrace of being placed lower than a man's self sufficiency had arrogated to him, and the honour paid to modest worth by wise princes, gave our Lord the occasion of counselling the guests; and that admonition forms one of the standard rules by which he deals with those who profess themselves his disciples. "Before honour is humility, and a haughty spirit before a fall." The last words, 'whom thine eyes have seen,' are thought by some learned men redundant; and some add them to the next verse: but perhaps they may allude to the case of a person newly brought to court, getting a sight of the prince, flattering himself with the hopes of high favour and preferment, but giving disgust by a self-sufficient conduct, and so finally excluded from the king's presence. An apt emblem of many vain-glorious professors of Christianity!

V. 8-10. Precipitation, in commencing contention, can arise only from fierce passions, pride, and ignorance or forgetfulness of consequences. This is equally applicable to engaging in foreign wars, or in civil dissensions; and to entering on law-suits, controversies, or any other private contests. They who are most eager to contend, are generally least able to maintain their ground: consequently their boastings and menaces frequently end in their own disgrace; and they bring themselves into inextricable difficulties. To avoid this, men should previously consider what they are about to do: and if they have been materially injured, they should calmly expostulate with their offending neighbour, and state to him their earnest desire of agreement upon any reasonable terms; and thus endeavour, by compromise or reference, to render an open contest unnecessary. None should, however, in any case, divulge private transactions to others, or traduce a man's character out of resentment: for this will take away the prospect of an amicable settlement; and if words of this kind be reported to him, and he can show them to be in any measure false and slanderous, or overcharged, the disgrace will rebound upon the speaker, and perhaps become indelible. (Matt. xviii. 15-17.) This is precisely the instruction of the New Testament. (Marg. Ref.) Solomon, speaking by divine inspiration, gave the same instructions, which were afterwards authoritatively given by his illustrious antitype.

V. 11, 12. A word of counsel, encouragement, or reproof, when it is spoken with propriety, and is well-timed, and suited to the occasion, is conspicuously beautiful. As when apples of gold are painted, or presented to our view, in lattice-work of silver; where 'the fine fruit' receives a new charm, by showing itself through the elegant apertures of the basket.' (Hervéy.) And when a wise reprover, and one that receives the reproof in good part, happen to meet, no jewels of gold can be so ornamental as this becoming behaviour.

V. 13. Liquor cooled with ice or snow, preserved or brought from the mountains for that purpose, according to the custom in hot countries, is very grateful in the heat of summer, especially to the husbandman when gathering in his harvest. Thus faithful ambassadors, or messengers, refresh the minds of those who employ them in business of great importance. (25.)

V. 14. 'He that makes bountiful promises of great gifts, which will never be performed, is like a cloud which makes a show of that rain, which it will not and cannot yield.' (Bp. Hall.) (Notes, Hos. vi. 4. Jude 12.)

V. 15. By submission, and patience under rebukes, and humble entreaties, even the prince, who has been greatly offended, may be pacified: whereas petulancy and passion would inflame his resentment, and prove of fatal consequence. Nay, soft persuasive language is generally the most effectual, to prevail over the obdurate mind and stubborn resolution, and to carry the point in the midst of great difficulties. The marrow cannot be obtained, "till the bone be broken:" this is therefore an apt emblem of the advantages of gentle means; which, contrary to apparent probability, break the bone that violence would have rendered more obdurate.

V. 16. Honey is often an emblem of sensual pleasure: though it be wholesome when eaten in moderation, yet when taken to excess it will produce a surfeit. Those animal indulgences, which are lawful in themselves, and placed within our reach; (as if we had found honey and it were all our own,) should yet be used with great moderation, or they will lead us into guilt and trouble.

V. 17. Our intercourse with neighbours cannot be conducted in comfort and cordiality, without discretion, as well as sincerity. Unseasonable, tedious, and too frequent visits, without any invitation, or upon such as is general and slight, and indulging too freely at the expense of others, will create disgust. Such behaviour leaves an unfavourable opinion of a man's character on the mind of his neighbour: and it not only appears selfish, but it presses too hard upon the other's selfishness, and on both accounts may probably terminate in weariness or even in enmity.

V. 18. A maul, &c. Or a club, by which a man is beaten down to the ground: a “dasher in pieces.” (Nah. ii. 1. original.)

V. 19. ‘As a broken tooth, or a leg out of joint, not only fails a man when he comes to use it, but likewise puts him in pain: so doth a faithless person serve them that depend on him, when they have the greatest need of his help. (Marg. Ref.) And such also is the confidence that the faithless person himself places in riches, or craft, or great friends: which some time or other will disappoint him to his great grief, when he expects the most from them.’ (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 20. It would be an inhumanity peculiarly unseasonable to take away a poor man's raiment, or the covering of his bed, in the depth of winter; and it is observed that when vinegar is poured on nitre, their contrariety produces a violent effervescence: so incongruous and disquieting are the expressions of excessive mirth, in company with one who is greatly troubled in his mind. Nitre, in this place, does not signify the salt now commonly so called, or saltpetre: but probably a fixed alkali called nitrum by the Romans: and certainly some alkaline composition, which was used instead of soap by the Jews. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 21, 22. The apostle hath quoted these verses from the Septuagint, verbatim, (except the last clause,) in his most beautiful exhortations to Christians, enforced by the consideration of the mercies of God to them. (Note, Rom. xii. 20, 21.) Such a quotation is the strongest testimony to the divine authority of the book whence it is made; and clearly evinces that the same rule of duty is contained in both testaments: however ancient scribes and pharisees, and modern writers in general, may have overlooked it. The law of love is not expounded more spiritually, in any single precept either of Christ or his apostles, than in this exhortation. Seize the moment of distress to show kindness to him that hates thee. This will resemble the effort of the refiner with a piece of metal, untractable by ordinary means: he surrounds it with coals intensely heated, and thus either melts or consumes it: and however the plan may succeed with him, who thus labours to overcome evil with good, “verily he shall in no wise lose his reward.”

V. 23. The meaning of this verse in our translation is obvious and instructive: yet the original seems to convey another meaning. “As the north wind produces rain,” (which it doth in some countries,) “so a back-biting tongue produceth an angry countenance.” Either interpretation shows how hateful back-biters are, and how they should be frowned upon.

V. 24. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 25. (Note, 13. Marg. Ref.)

V. 26. A troubled fountain or corrupt spring sends forth polluted streams, to the disappointment and annoyance of the neighbourhood. Thus, when a righteous man falls into any evident sin, in the presence of the wicked; or when he pays unseemly homage to them, from fear or interest; or when he falls under their oppressive power; in different ways these events tend to prejudice and embolden the minds of sinners, and are a grief, a snare, or a discouragement to the servants of God.

V. 27. To supply a negative, in order to explain a maxim of wisdom, as in this verse, seems indefensible: and yet, of the various interpretations which have been proposed, in order to avoid this difficulty, none gives satisfaction, at least to me. Might not the latter clause be read interrogatively: "To eat honey to excess is not good: and "is it glory for men to seek their own glory?" A moderate regard to reputation is proper; as it is to eat honey moderately: but does not the vain-glorious man run into pernicious excess, by rioting on what he delights in, as much as the man who eats honey, till he surfeits with it? (Note, 16.)

V. 28. The man who has no command over his passions, especially over his anger, lies open to the assault of every invader: any one may exasperate and torment him, and rob him of his comfort, his peace, and his reason at pleasure: every temptation seduces him into sin, and the most trifling concerns involve him in the most serious contests.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15.

We ought carefully to collect, and readily to communicate, the instructive lessons which wise and good men have left behind them: but selection is in this case of vast importance. The whole of what even Solomon wrote was not thought proper to be published. And to communicate to the public indiscriminately, all that eminent men have left in manuscript, is not only an injustice to their characters, but a detriment to mankind: by these means the effusions of an unguarded hour are sent forth into the world under the sanction of a great name; and, alas! men's follies and mistakes are more likely to meet a favourable reception, than the result of their sober judgment and mature deliberation. This is therefore always an injudicious, and often an infamous, because a mercenary, practice. It is not for us presumptuously to search into the deep things of God, whose glory it is to conceal his decrees in impenetrable secrecy: but let us diligently learn his revealed will, that we may believe and do it, and humbly bound our inquiries where he bounds his information. For how should we be able to know any thing of his unrevealed purposes; when we cannot discover the intentions of our earthly governors with any certainty, unless they inform us of them? The honour of kings does not consist in external magnificence, numerous attendants, powerful armies, or splendid achievements: much less in domineering over their subjects, and in indulging their lusts and passions. But it consists in diligently learning and attending to the duties of their high station; and in rendering their whole administration equitable, salutary, and conducive to the peace and happiness of mankind; and in copying His example, who "putteth away the ungodly as dross," that "their thrones may be established in righteousness." For the reformation of the court, and the good example of those who possess authority or favour with the prince, will produce a salutary effect through the subordinate ranks of the community. This indeed is an arduous attempt, and requires both resolution and address: a frowning countenance, and severe reproofs, and decisive measures must be used; and men's characters must be inquired into, and made trial of, as the finer discriminates between the gold and the dross. But the advantages will abundantly compensate the trouble, to those who are enabled to go through with such a reform. The vain-glorious men; who boast themselves of those talents and endowments which they possess not, and excite expectations which they are sure to disappoint; being like clouds and wind without rain; and who assume the chief places, and claim the precedency wherever they go, are not fit to be employed in services of this kind. Indeed, whether such persons are found in palaces or churches, they are to be suspected and kept down. He who is fit to stand in the presence of the king, does not at first sight, or upon the first intimations of favour, aspire to the chief places, or want to thrust out his seniors and superiors: but is diffident, and reluctant to engage in such arduous affairs; and it will be needful to invite him to "come up hither;" and not to put him lower in the presence of the prince, than he hath placed himself. And, in like manner, he who is qualified to be the minister of the Lord of hosts, and hath seen his glory in the face of Jesus Christ, will be proportionably sensible of his own unworthiness and insufficiency. He may be induced by zeal and love, and a sense of duty, to desire this good work, but he will not rush upon it with an inconsiderate forwardness; nor be disposed to thrust himself into the most conspicuous places, but be satisfied in an obscure sphere, until he be evidently called up higher. Thus in every thing modesty and humility attend real excellency, and precede durable honour: but pride and ostentation are evidences of a worthless character, and lead to contempt and disgrace. The love of peace, and that gentle and circumspect behaviour which best secures it, spring from humility. He who considers the fatal effects of contention in public and in private life, will use every means to avoid all occasions of it. He will meditate seriously upon the causes and consequences of any contest, before he will venture upon it: he will practise equity, sincerity, candour, and long forbearance; and will study that softness of speech that breaketh the bone, and disarmeth the resentment of the powerful, or the haughty, and winneth to reason and justice those who are infringing on the rights of others. He will not disclose to another person the injuries that he hath received, till he hath debated the matter with the injurious party: much less will he propagate a distorted and aggravated report, as is too common in such cases. Thus he will be generally enabled to avoid litigations: whilst precipitation, unguarded language, and partial and public statements of facts to the injury of men's reputations, lead to irreconcilable discords; and often terminate in irretrievable detriment to the circumstances and character of the offender. And let it be observed, that the hasty entrance upon religious controversy is as perilous to a man's spirit, as engaging in a duel is to his life; and is often as fatal to the welfare of the church, as needless wars are to the community. It is well worth our while to study acceptable words fitted to take effect; and to know how both to give seasonable counsel, and to yield an obedient ear to salutary reproof; which is very becoming a man professing godliness, and peculiarly conducive to his advantage and usefulness. Indeed prudence, modesty, and faithfulness, will render a man valuable in every situation, from that of an ambassador to a powerful monarch, to that of an ordinary messenger to a man of low condition; and will conduce greatly to the comfort of those who employ him.

V. 16—28.

In public as well as in private life, misplaced confidence must induce uneasiness, disappointment, and disasters: and if a monarch rely on a mercenary and unfaithful minister of state, he can have no security that he will not betray him in the critical conjuncture, like a broken tooth, and a foot out of joint, and thus involve him in the deepest distress. And what fidelity to his prince can be expected from him who is a daring rebel against God, and who sacrifices every relative and domestic duty to the indulgence of his avarice or his lust? But a minister who feareth God and worketh righteousness, and whose integrity and prudence are approved, relieves him of his cares and solicitude, and excites the confidence that good news will be heard, from time to time, out of those distant countries with which he is connected, which will be grateful as the cold water to the thirsty traveller. How welcome then should the faithful messengers of God be to us, who are approved by their Lord for declaring the truth as it is! and who bring good news from heaven, that far country, from which we sinners had great reason to expect heavy tidings! May he furnish and send forth such into all the nations of the earth! In order to live in peace, and to be prepared to resist temptation, nothing is more important than habitual self-government: for “he that hath no rule over his own spirit, is like a city that is broken down, and without walls.” In this case a man lies open to the incursion of every enemy: and if he listen, (as it is most likely he will,) to false witnesses and slanderers, his life must be one continued scene of contention and vexation, of sin and misery. Indeed, we ought not only to avoid these hateful and mischievous vices ourselves, but to frown every calumniator from our presence: and a frown will generally suffice, for they seldom persevere in coming where they are not made welcome. But self-government must be exercised over all our passions and appetites, even in respect of things lawful; that, while many ruin themselves and others by criminal gratifications, and some are useless, troublesome, and uncomfortable through inexpedient indulgence: we may know how to use the good gifts of Providence with thankful moderation, to take what is conducive to health and comfort, and to avoid all excess. It is also incumbent upon us to conduct our social intercourse with our neighbours in a prudent manner, without encroaching, or giving umbrage to them: at the same time we may be thankful, that we never can come to the Lord unseasonably, or too frequently; and that he will never be weary of us, or displeased with us, for asking too much of him: and we should make his love, and not man's selfishness, the pattern of our conduct toward others, though not of our expectations from them. We should also learn to sympathize with the afflicted; and we ought no more to wound their feelings by impertinent levity, than to injure the poor by cruelty and oppression: and we ought steadily and constantly to be aiming to overcome evil with good; and to watch for an opportunity, when an enemy is in want or trouble, to show our good-will to him by a seasonable relief. This may melt him into kindness: or if, contrary to our intention, it should only increase his guilt, yet it will conduce to our own good, and the Lord will reward us. We should moreover keep a peculiar watch over our tempers and our words, whilst in the company of ungodly men: and we ought by no means to pay undue respect to them for any secular ends: lest our example should produce a prejudicial effect on others, and leave an unfavourable impression concerning our religion on their minds. If we see the righteous cast down by oppression before the wicked, we should desire to possess our souls in faith and patience, and to keep silence in so evil a time. And though we may not seek our own glory, yet the honour of our profession should be very near our hearts; and we ought to be willing rather to suffer death, than to live to the disgrace of the doctrine of God our Saviour.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVI. V. 1. Snow in summer and rain in harvest are unseasonable, and often prejudicial, in every country: but in the land of Canaan they were unusual, and denoted the divine displeasure. Thus the advancement of ignorant and wicked men to dignity and authority, especially in Israel, was ominous, and foreboded the pouring out of divine judgments upon the nation. ‘The blending together of summer and winter, would not cause a greater disorder in the natural world, than the disposal of honour to bad men does in the moral world.’ (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 2. The birds which fly over our heads cannot hurt us, and they will soon return to their nests from which they wandered. In like manner, unmerited anathemas, imprecations, and calumnies, will not eventually harm us; but will alight on those who uttered them.

V. 3. The whip and the bridle are needful for the proper management of the horse or the ass, and every creature must be dealt with according to its nature: but the nature of careless and profligate sinners is such, that they will not be ruled by reason and persuasion, and therefore severe treatment must be their portion.

V. 4, 5. 'Consent not to his doings.' 'Reprove him as the matter requireth.' It is highly improper to answer a fool, in his own foolish manner; to meet him on his own ground; to retort on him his scurrilous, abusive, impertinent language; to enter on disputes with him, and answer his vain cavils or objections; or to treat his folly and impiety, as if it were worthy of notice or refutation. This would be doing him an honour, to which he is not entitled; and by thus descending to his level, his opponent would insensibly get into his trifling, contentious, railing spirit, and become like unto him. But it is important to consider the character and intentions of men; and to level an answer against a foolish and impertinent railer and caviller, with such poignancy, and force of argument, as may admit of no reply: and so to adapt the remarks to the man, and address them to his conscience, as may best expose his ignorance or malice, stop his mouth, and end the debate at once. A notorious profligate, scoffer, or infidel, has no just claim to that respectful treatment, to which a more modest and decent inquirer is entitled: for this would feed his vanity and augment his self-importance. But a decided and pointed answer to his captious queries, that manifests the ignorance and wickedness which dictated them, forms the proper method of dealing with him. So that we should not answer a foolish man in a foolish manner: but we should answer him in a way suited to expose his folly, to mortify his pride, and to prevent others from being deluded by him. Of this we have very many beautiful examples in the history of Jesus Christ. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6. He who employs an ignorant and worthless man in any important business, as it were, cuts off his own feet, puts himself to much pain, disables himself, and retards his affairs; and he can expect nothing but disappointment, vexation, and damage in abundance, as the recompense of his folly. The princes of this world sometimes employ such envoys: but the Lord never sends those as his messengers who do not understand, or are not able to deliver their message, or whose foolish and wicked conduct is an habitual disgrace to him; though many such wear the garb, and appear in the character, of his messengers.

V. 7. 'Lift ye up the legs of the lame, what doth it help him?' The clause is generally understood, of a lame man's affectation of agility; though indeed he never moves so ungracefully as when he affects to be nimble: and thus a foolish man never appears to so great a disadvantage, as when he pretends to wisdom. He either shows his ignorance and folly, by speaking things false and inapplicable to the occasion: or the wise remarks, which he hath picked up, are so contrary to his own general conduct and converse, that they render him the more contemptible. (Note, xvii. 7.)

V. 8. He, who fixes a stone in a sling, probably prepares mischief for somebody, perhaps for himself: so does he who confers authority on a foolish and wicked man, or helps to advance his reputation. It is like putting a sword or a loaded pistol into a madman's hand.

V. 9. A drunken man will heedlessly lay hold on thorns, or other sharp things, which run into his hand; and perhaps be insensible to it, till he becomes sober, and the wound begins to rankle. Thus a parable, or wise observation, is so ill managed by a fool, that it wounds himself by exposing his wickedness, and increasing his condemnation: and though he may not be sensible of it at present, yet he will be, when he shall be condemned out of his own mouth, and by his own doctrine.

V. 10. This proverb may either declare how the Lord, the Creator of all men, will deal with sinners, according to the degrees and aggravations of their guilt; whether they be ignorant, careless, or presumptuous: or how the great and powerful among men, who do so much towards forming the manners of all others, ought to act. Instead of honouring and employing worthless and wicked men, they ought to disgrace and punish them according to their deserts. The margin reads it; A great man grieveth all, and he hireth the fool, he hireth also the transgressors. But the sense may thus be more clearly expressed, 'when he hireth the fool, and hireth the transgressors.'

V. 11. This greedy animal, which alone is observed to act in the manner described, is the loathsome emblem of those sinners, who return to their vices, after they have in various ways smarted for them, and been made conscious of their folly in them: they seem to be weary of their sins, and to repent of them; but they soon shake off the conviction, and return to them with more greediness than ever. Do any feel disgusted at the allusion? Let them remember, that the emblem is far less filthy than the thing denoted by it: and that the whole race of animals does not afford any thing so debasing, as not to be far out-done by the excesses of libertines, and drunkards, and gluttons. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12. If the sottish person above described, 'be not altogether insensible of his folly, nor refuse admonition; there is more hope of his amendment, than of his, who takes himself to be so wise and virtuous, that he despises his betters, and thinks himself above instruction.' (Bp. Patrick.)

'idleness.' (Bp. Patrick.) Two words are used here, both of which are translated lion: but the former is generally supposed to signify a most fierce and large lion. Lions, however, are seldom to be met with in the streets: and are generally in their dens, when man is required to attend to his work. As the door moves on, but not from, its hinges; so the slothful move on, but not from, their beds: or, at best, they make no progress in any employment. The most needful exertion is grievous to them: ease is their chief good, the preservation of it for the present, is their chief wisdom: and whilst they sacrifice to this base end the interests of time and eternity, they foolishly deem themselves wiser than all those who render a reason why they should bestir themselves, and attend to their business and duty.

V. 17. To take a part in quarrels, in which men have no concern; or even zealously to interfere to settle disputes and litigations, where neither party is disposed to take their advice, is a great imprudence, and is sure to lead them into many difficulties. It is as if a man should seize a fierce dog by the ears as he passed him, by which he could expect no other than to be bitten: and it is hard to say, whether it would be safest to try to hold him, or to let him go.

V. 18, 19. A madman, without intentional malice, may do immense mischief in a very little time, by firing houses, or murdering those whom he meets; and it may be an entertainment for him. But he who, without the excuse of madness, diverts himself with imposing upon his neighbour, and leading him into errors, contentions, and trouble, merely that he may laugh at his distresses, is a man of a most mischievous disposition, and worthy of the severest punishment, or the closest confinement. The word rendered madman, seems to mean one who feigns himself mad; and then the propriety of the similitude would lie in the false pretences under which each of the persons did the mischief. One pretends to be mad; the other to be in jest: but this makes no amends to the injured party.

V. 20, 21. 'Look on him as an incendiary, that carries tales, and whispers false stories; and expel him from the family:—for as the fire will go out, if you take away the wood that feeds it; so will quarrels and contentions cease, when it is thrust out of doors that blows up the flame.' (Bp. Patrick.) (Note, xxii. 10.)

V. 22. (Note, xviii. 8.)

V. 23. A potsherd, when lacquered over with silver dross instead of lead, may appear valuable to ignorant people; but it is as worthless as ever, and more fitted for the purposes of imposition. Thus when men gloss over their malicious and selfish intentions with warm professions of affection, they become the more dangerous deceivers.—Some indeed interpret burning lips, to mean passionate and malicious language: but in that case, the potsherd appears without disguise.

V. 24—27. These verses seem to be connected together, and likewise with the preceding verse. 'He that harbours enmity in his heart, pretends friendship with his lips,' (or 'shall be discovered by his lips.')

Do not credulously listen to his flatteries and professions of regard and esteem; (in which he will often overact his part); for he conceals many base designs within. But wait a while, without committing thyself; and if his hatred be covered with deceit; his wickedness will ere long be publicly exposed: He will fall into the pit he hath bestowed pains to dig for thee, and be crushed by the stone which he meant to roll upon thee. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 28. Calumny is the offspring of malice, and an open declaration of enmity: and the slanderer, instead of pitying the man whom he hath wounded by his lies, becomes more inveterate in his hatred of him, through fear of being exposed, or feeling the weight of his vengeance. Yet the flatterer is the more dangerous character: his poison is more insinuating and unsuspected; and it tends to increase pride and to inflame the passions, and to prompt a man to

CHAP. XXVII.

Maxims against procrastination or car-those undertakings, for which he is not qualified, and which prove ruinous to him.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16.

When ungodly and unqualified men are advanced to authority, we are called on to prepare for correction, and to repent of our sins. But if our ways please God, we need not fear either the oppressor's iron rod, or the persecutor's impious anathema, or the enraged imprecations of those who delight in cursing. In such cases, let us hold our peace, keep on our way, and trust in the Lord; and then we shall be blessed in him, let who will menace, curse, or revile. The great God, that formed all things, will recompense such men, in due time, according to their folly and wickedness: and if the kings of the earth, instead of copying his example, and treating infidels and profligates with marked disapprobation, will caress and honour them, they will be sure to prove a hinderance and a detriment to all their undertakings: and what mischief they will do to others cannot be ascertained; for "as he that bindeth a stone in a sling, so is he that giveth honour to a fool." It behooves every one to take warning, and not be "like unto the horse, or mule, that have no understanding;" for then, severe discipline will be requisite, and great plagues remain for those that are obstinate in impiety. But whilst we follow after Wisdom ourselves, we shall constantly need her counsels how to behave towards foolish and impious men. In language which the superficial reader may perhaps deem contradictory, the divine Instructor marks out that line of conduct to us, which afterwards in human nature he most perfectly observed. The disciple of Christ, keeping his example in view, will never answer the impertinence, the boasts, the scoffs, or the blasphemies of fools, in such a manner as to become like unto them: but, keeping at a distance from wrath and railing, from levity and ostentation, and from a boisterous disdainful style or manner, he will know how to answer their folly with brevity and decision, so as to silence them and put them to shame, when they expect to triumph and be applauded; that they may neither be wise in their own conceit, nor deceive the ignorant by their empty but confident pretensions. But he that would attain to this useful endowment, must begin by practising what he has learned: otherwise the wisest and most pointed observations, will be as the unequal legs of the lame, or as a parable in the mouth of a fool: they will give those, against whom they are directed, an opportunity to retort, "Physician, heal thyself," and to call the attention of the hearers to the inconsistency of this or the other part of his conduct, with their own doctrine: thus they will only expose and wound himself; nay, it will turn to his condemnation, that he has not profited by his own preaching. Nor must this practice be a mere partial, or external matter: for until the love of sinful pleasures and advantages be mortified, and the love nal security, vain-glory, wrath, and envy, 1—4. Concerning reproof, contentment, steadiness, friendship, and prudence, 5—12. Against suretyship, of God and holiness implanted in our hearts; we shall still be numbered amongst the foolish: and, notwithstanding convictions and partial reformations, shall be ready, when tempted, to return to folly, as the dog to his vomit. Pride also must be peculiarly guarded against: for it is evidenced by facts, that no careless, profligate, or ignorant unbeliever, is so hopeless as the man who is wise in his own conceit. Thus self-sufficient professors of evangelical doctrines, and pharisaical formalists, and philosophical infidels, are, of all other descriptions of men, the least likely to repent and obey the Gospel: and the instances of conversion are more unfrequent among them than among publicans and harlots; because they are more wise in their own conceit; and, thinking that they see, they are at rest in their ten-fold darkness. Nor are any persons more likely to be taken in this snare, than those who are slothful in the concerns of their souls. They take the most important matters upon trust, or are satisfied with a superficial inquiry: their sloth retains them in ignorance and error, and their ignorance fosters their self-conceit. Nay, they think themselves extremely wise, in having hit upon a method of quieting their consciences, without renouncing their ease, interest, or indulgence; and they ignorantly flatter themselves, that they know how to serve God and mammon, and to get to heaven without self-denial, striving, or labour. Some of this stamp exclaim, 'All this is legal, we must be saved by grace alone: why tell you us of diligence, obedience, and good works?' Others rest in a formal profession: they deny not that such and such things should be done; but there is always some lion in the way at the present. They cannot be quite at rest in their negligence: but they can no more find in their hearts to renounce it, than the sluggard can to leave his bed. They have a scanty round of outward observances, in which they move as the door on the hinges, but they get no further: they are ingenious at devising excuses for neglecting every duty which would cost them any thing; nay, they pride themselves in this ingenuity: they starve their souls, because they will not bestow pains to feed them, though the Bread of life is set before them: and yet though their conduct be so irrational and ruinous, they will deem themselves wiser than all that would teach them better; and will be offended with every one who refuses to flatter them in this fond conceit of themselves.

V. 17—28.

True wisdom is always attended with humility and diligence: and it will direct a man in the most difficult circumstances. He who truly seeks this gift from God, by fervent prayers, will know when to attempt the blessed work of a peace-maker, and when to stand aloof from contentions which do not belong to him. He will be far from deceiving or injuring any one, and then saying, "am I not in sport?" For it is diabolical to delight in mischief: it is the part of a mad-man to cast about fire-brands, arrows, and death; and they, who tell lies to make themselves merry, will easily be tempted to tell lies to make themselves rich: so that he who regards the word of God, will abhor all falsehood; but that most which is most mischievous. The lies of the tale-bearer will appear to him peculiarly aggravated: for little bickerings in families and neighbourhoods, would generally cease in a short time, did not these officious incendiaries, from direct love to contention, bring wood and coals, to kindle and keep up the fire. Thus their words are irreparably mischievous, and their characters completely odious. The Christian, no doubt, desires to hope the best of every one, as far as facts will admit of it: but his candour is not folly; he must judge of men by the general tenour of their conduct; and if they are evidently selfish, envious, or malicious, he cannot value their fulsome professions of affection, and the crafty dissimulation by which they cover over their wickedness, the deceit which is harboured within, and their purposes of hatred and malice. Indeed whatever is excessive is suspicious: and though Christians should be harmless as doves, they need to be wise as serpents; that they may not, by believing fair words, sanction or receive detriment from such, as have seven abominations in their hearts. For whilst the open calumniator is a bitter and cruel enemy, the insidious flatterer is still more to be dreaded and shunned; for he will stab a man as Joab did Amasa, whilst he salutes him, and betray him as Judas did Jesus, with a kiss. But let such men remember, that he whose hatred is covered with deceit, his wickedness will be showed before the assembled world: and they who devise mischief for others, will themselves be overwhelmed by it, and sink into it for ever.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVII. V. 1. 'Be not so confident of thy present power, riches, or any thing else, as to grow presumptuous, and brag what thou wilt do or enjoy hereafter: for thou canst not be secure of this very day,—which may produce something, for any thing thou knowest, that shall spoil all thy designs, and frustrate all thy expectations, which thou hast for to-morrow.' (Bp. Patrick.) 'Delay not the time, but take the occasion when it is offered.' (Marg. Ref.)

'is easier to bear, than a man without understanding.' (Ecclesiasticus.) (Note, xxix. 9.) The effects of a foolish and wicked man's ungoverned rage are more intolerable than the heaviest burden, or the hardest labour.

V. 4. Violent passion and deep resentment are often very cruel and outrageous, and produce dreadful effects; yet the one is soon over; and the other may be mollified by prudent concessions and repeated favours: but envy is excited, (not by affronts or misconduct, but,) by the too conspicuous talents or performances of one who is considered as a competitor; by the praises bestowed on him, and the favour shown him; and the more wisely and well the envied person behaves, the more will envy increase in the breast of his jealous rival. There is therefore little to be done to abate its force, and there is no standing against it, when the envious person is in authority: and it is often best to retire out of the reach of its effects, as David did from the envy of Saul. The original word for envy is often rendered jealousy: and the passion is the same, though the object or occasion be different. It is a spirit of rivalry, or competition, either for the favour of an individual, or for public applause, or some other object; mingled with haughty indignation, malignity, and enmity, at being supplanted, undervalued, and eclipsed; or envenomed suspicions that this is the case, or fears that it will soon become so. When the word is used concerning God, it denotes his holy zeal for the honour of his own name, and determination to punish those who give his glory to another. It is therefore often translated zeal, and then it is either a fervent regard for the glory of God, shown in a holy manner consistent with love to all men; or a proud and eager desire of a man's own honour or that of his party, manifested with bitterness, adopting unhallowed means of securing success, and thus degenerating into envy of the worst kind; even such as instigated the crucifiers of Christ, and the antichristian persecutors of his church in subsequent ages; and as excites fierce controversies, base slanders, and deep-rooted malice, between bigots and zealots of different descriptions.

V. 5. Plain and faithful rebukes, prudently given, are better effects of friendship, than that excessive tenderness and respect, which connives at a man's faults, for fear of paining or offending him: so that open rebuke is not only preferable to secret enmity; but even to secret love, which in this respect is of no real service to the beloved person.

cutting; but he never cuts wider or deeper than he judges necessary. Such is the conduct of the faithful, affectionate, and discreet reprover: such are the corrections of our heavenly Friend. But the flatterer and false friend, who cloaks his malice under the language and demeanor of excessive love, only aims to deceive and ruin us. The latter clause is variously rendered. 'The kisses of him that hates are frequent.' They "are to be deprecated." 'We had need to pray him to forbear, and pray God to pre-serve us from being too credulous.' (Bp. Patrick.) 'They are pleasant.' (Old Translation.) Expressions of kindness, though excessive, are so agreeable, that most men prefer them to plain-dealing: so that the fulsome flatterer is generally caressed as a friend, and the faithful reprover shunned as an enemy; to the unspeakable detriment of mankind.

V. 7. Abundance and excess spoil the appetite, and prevent the luxurious from relishing any of their delicacies. But he who labours hard, and fares meanly, and eats not till he is hungry, relishes the most unsavoury morsel; which gives poverty an advantage, as to real enjoyment, almost sufficient to counter-balance all its disadvantages. — In like manner the proud and self-sufficient disdain the provisions of the Gospel; but "the poor in spirit," and "they who hunger and thirst after righteousness," can find much comfort from every part of the word of God, and from the meanest book, or sermon, which accords to it.

V. 8. The bird that forsakes its nest, leaves the place where it had found repose, warmth, and shelter, and thus is exposed to various hardships and dangers. Thus every man has his proper place in society, in which he may be safe and comfortable: but when, out of levity, discontent, avarice, or ambition, he rashly quits it, he generally changes imaginary for real disquietudes. In like manner, they who are never easy at home, and in their own families and employments, seldom prosper, or are happy any where: and they who affect to appear like their superiors, generally bring themselves into difficulties. There may be cases, in which it is a man's duty and prudence to change his situation, or employment, but then he will do it upon good grounds, and with deliberation. Every man hath calls from home; but a prudent man will be glad to return, when the end of his absence is effected. But an unsettled, roving, dissatisfied spirit; a turn for scheming and shifting from one place or undertaking to another; an aversion to a man's own situation or business, are extremely dangerous and sinful.

V. 9. The affectionate and faithful counsel of a cordial friend is more refreshing to a man in trouble, than any ointment or perfumes could be to his senses. The verse, however, has been rendered, perhaps more literally, "As ointment and perfume gladden the heart; so the sweetness of a friend, does every one, more than hearty counsel." An affectionate manner, though of less intrinsic value, is so generally more acceptable than the most prudent and sincere good advice, given rudely, that in order to do good, the sweetness of the manner, as well as the integrity and faithfulness of the intention, and the wisdom of the counsel, should be carefully attended to.

V. 10. It is generally most advisable to cultivate the friendship of those who have shown themselves attached to a man by inclination and esteem; and of those who have been the friends of his father and family. Such are generally more to be depended on in trying circumstances, than the nearest relations. And indeed, prudent, pious, and honest men may expect to obtain friends in the neighbourhood where they live; who are nearer at hand, and more ready to assist than relations, who perhaps are as far off in affection as in their places of abode. 'As a man that is closely joined to us in affection, is better than one of our nearest kindred, whose heart is not knit to us: so a neighbour near at hand, is better than either friend or brother, who is so far off that we may perish before he come to our assistance.' (Bp. Patrick.) "God is a present Help in time of trouble:" but saints and angels, to whom numbers pray, must as to most of them, be, at best, the friend or brother that is far off.

V. 11. This may be intended as the address of an affectionate parent to his son; whose prudent conduct would both gladden his heart, and furnish him with an answer to those who reproached him as negligent of the duties of that relation. But "Wisdom also is justified of her children," from the reproaches of her enemies: and the good conduct of professed Christians supplies the most effectual answer to those who reproach the Gospel as tending to licentiousness.

they put a man off his guard, and tend to give force to his passions; and they excite envy, and set men to hunt after his faults, that they may blacken that character which is enhanced so much above their level. So that he who makes it his great business, (as if he rose early in the morning for that single purpose,) to lavish praises on any one whom he calls his friend or benefactor; and who bestows pains to proclaim his excellencies and bounty to every body, will not be looked upon by a wise man much more favourably than if he had traduced or cursed him: nay, he will think the friendship of so injudicious or designing a man, a disgrace rather than an honour to him.—Some interpret the clause, “rising early in the morning,” of too great haste in lavishly commending. ‘There is ^e nothing more dangerous than to cry up men too soon, ^e before they be sufficiently tried: for this, instead of ^e doing them service, many times proves their ruin.’ (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 15, 16. (xix. 13.) Litigious neighbours sometimes excite contentions, which resemble a hasty shower that is soon over: but a contentious wife is as the constant dropping through a decayed roof in a very rainy day: so that a man can neither keep himself dry out of doors nor in the house. The utmost meekness and prudence will be found, in such a case, insufficient to conceal her unseemly behaviour: however a man might be disposed to connive at, or hide, her faults, her own unruly temper will betray them, and render their disagreements the common topic of conversation: even as it is impossible to conceal the boisterous wind; and as the fragrant of the ointment would make him known, who had anointed his hands with it, whatever pains he took to hide it. ‘The best way for a man to avoid the ^e trouble of a bad wife is, not to choose one for his consort, ^e because she is rich, or because she is beautiful only; but ^e because she is like him in humour, inclination, and condition,’ &c. (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 17. Iron is often most effectually used to sharpen iron: and thus friends or correspondent dispositions what each other’s ingenuity; suggest useful hints and good counsels; encourage one another against despondency, and excite such as grow slack: and thus they help one another forward in every useful attempt. (Marg. Ref.) The advantages of society and conversation are thus emphatically shown. Indeed it has been observed, that the most useful inventions have originated from the collision of men’s thoughts, when earnestly engaged in conversation.

V. 18. The labour of planting and pruning the fig-tree, is recompensed by the sweet fruit that it yields: thus menial servants may obtain solid reputation and advantage, by attending diligently to the duties of their situation, though obscure and laborious. ‘He that faithfully defends ^e his master’s person or reputation, and takes care his estate is not wasted, shall in due time be largely rewarded.’ (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 19. The reflection from the clear water or mirror corresponds to the face of him that looks in it: thus do the hearts of men to each other. The judgments, dispositions, desires, and imaginations of sinners, are much the same; or only varied by constitution, habit, education, and rank in life. Godly people are very much of the same judgment and disposition, as to the main things, in proportion to their degree of grace and information. The opposition between conscience and inclination is much the same in one wicked man as in another; except as some are more ignorant, or more hardened than others. The conflict betwixt corrupt nature and grace is similar in all believers; and their varying joys, sorrows, hopes, fears, and other experiences, have a surprising coincidence: so that he who well knows and watches his own heart, will not greatly be a stranger to those of other men; but will often so speak to their secret thoughts and purposes, that he will appear to have received some special information about them. In order then to know human nature, we should first study our own hearts, in all the variety of situations in which we are successively placed. This proverb, however, is variously interpreted: ‘As a man may know what kind of face he ^e hath, if he will look into the water: so he may know what ^e kind of man he is, if he will examine his conscience.’ (Castalio.) This is an important instruction: but it does not seem the sense of the maxim. ‘A man may see himself, while he looks upon other men, as well as know ^e other men by considering his own inclination.’ (Lord Bacon’s interpretation stated by Bp. Patrick.) Indeed this seems the true interpretation, provided another idea be suggested. ‘There is no difference between man and ^e man by nature; but only the grace of God maketh the ^e difference.’

V. 20. The grave still yawns to receive the bodies of men, though it has devoured innumerable millions; and the place of separate spirits for their souls: nay, the pit of destruction is still open to receive the wicked. Thus insatiable are the senses, appetites, and hearts of men: curiosity, thirst for novelty, variety, and ornament; covetousness, ambition, sensuality, even blood-thirstiness, are all insatiable, and grow more craving by indulgence: they still devour, and demand more and more. V. 21. The characters of men may be in some measure known, by considering what sort of persons most commend them : but more decidedly by observing the effects which praise produces on them. If a man, when greatly applauded, grow insolent and assuming ; if he affect state, and become negligent or above his work ; and be disappointed and peevish when not commended ; and if this be habitual to him, it proves him to be dross, which will not endure the furnace. But if applause render a man more circumspect in his walk, and diligent in his duty : if he remain contented in his former situation, and easy in performing obscure services : if he continue modest in his deportment, and affable to men of low estate ; and if this appear unaffected and habitual, it marks him gold : and he who can endure this furnace, and grow purer in it, will not be injured by any other. There are many degrees between the two extremes ; and a man's character must rise or fall, in the judgment of wise men, according as he approaches to one or the other of them.

V. 22. The straw and chaff may be separated from the wheat by threshing and winnowing; nay, the husks may be beaten off, by braying it in a mortar: but no afflictions, or punishments, however severe, will cure a hardened and impious profligate of his folly and wickedness. His heart and life are all of a piece, and no human power can make any separation. They who argue that the miseries of hell will mend the disposition of impenitent sinners, and prepare them for a release, should consider this proverb carefully: and they should remember, that the new-creating power of God's grace is alone effectual to produce this change; and that the torments of hell are never mentioned among the appointed means of grace.

V. 23—27. These verses recommend the advantages of private life; and show that diligence in rural employments, and the plenty which is obtained by it, are more conducive to true happiness, than the unstable and uneasy, though splendid, possessions of wealth and authority. Riches are very precarious, and kingdoms are often transferred from one family to another. But he who hath an estate, or farm, in the country, and diligently attends to it, will see his provisions springing out of the earth to repay his toil, and sensibly coming from the hand of God. He will have suitable and sufficient food and raiment, for himself, and his family, and domestics: and though it be homely and frugal, it will be wholesome and comfortable; and attended with little care, risk, or temptation. And he who is thus provided for, and has a contented mind, needs not, and will not, envy the king on his throne, being far safer and happier than he.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Y. 1-12.

In this uncertain world we “know not what a day may bring forth.” We may be deprived of our limbs, senses, faculties, or lives, or experience the most distressing changes in our circumstances and connexions, before another day be gone. We should never then presume upon to-morrow; or boast what we will be, or do, hereafter; or postpone any needful work to a future time. Numbers have perished through procrastination; numbers, with declining faculties, and drawing near the close of life, have lamented their lost opportunities of usefulness. Whilst “the simple pass on, and are punished” for their neglect of the one thing needful; every prudent man will foresee these and similar evils, and take proper measures to avoid them. And as life is so short and fleeting; and our present conduct has so intimate a connexion with our eternal condition, it is inconsistent with true wisdom to spend our time and thoughts in devising needless changes in our outward condition; or to wander from our proper place and business, in pursuit of imaginary advantages. Rather let us seek to the Lord to give us a contented mind, in the situation which he hath assigned us, and a heart to delight in our present duty: that, having chosen him for our Portion, and being humbly sensible how much our comforts exceed our deservings: and applying ourselves diligently to the business of our station, we may be able to get rid of all roving desires. In order to this, counsel, and even rebuke, is often necessary: (even as medicines and surgical operations, though nauseous and painful, are for our bodies;) and they should be considered as the most disinterested and valuable friends, who venture our displeasure, by faithfully seeking our highest and most durable good. Indeed no wise and cordial friends will “suffer sin upon us,” by neglecting this needful proof of love: in their better judgment they know it to be salutary; and though it wounds, and pains, yet “faithful are the wounds of a friend;” and afterwards at least, all sound characters will be better pleased with it, than with the reserved and less cordial affections of those who would have left them to go on in their errors and sins. They who have such friends as these (and the pious children of pious parents will generally be so favoured,) should be very careful not to forsake or lose them: and it is much wiser to endeavour, by good behaviour, to attach those who may be ready to help us in trouble from genuine affection, than to apply to rich relations, in whom the tie of blood is seldom so powerful as regard to interest. In every case we should endeavour to win upon the esteem of all around us; and to shun envy, as much as we can consistently with our duty. It is very easy to create ourselves enemies, and to exasperate them; but it is more difficult to pacify their wrath, which is often cruel and outrageous in its effects. We ought not indeed to desire the friendship of foolish and wicked men: yet we should be very careful not to provoke them; for, not being to be mollified by concessions, or convinced by arguments, their wrath will be found more heavy than the sand, or the ponderous rock, and will bear down all before it. But envy is still more malignant, being rendered more vehement by that very wisdom and goodness, which tend to disarm every other species of resentment. We must not, however, cease to act wisely, or to do good, in order to avoid even envy: but we should shun ostentation and competition: and whilst we study to behave in such a manner, that strangers, and all impartial persons, may be constrained to applaud our good works; we should not only not praise ourselves, but not even needlessly mention our services, or fish for commendation. But, alas! high commendations and warm professions of affection, though nothing is done to prove them sincere, are almost universally more welcome than plain-dealing, even when attended by the most indisputable proofs of genuine and cordial friendship. The ointment and perfume, the sweetness of the manner, even in a flatterer, and one not credited as sincere, outweighs in the scales of human intercourse, the solid bullion of cordial friendship in an uncouth garb, and hearty counsel not gracefully imparted. In like manner, who almost is able to rise above the fascinating impositions of the world? Who can help estimating men's happiness by their wealth and prosperity? Yet the single indisputable fact, that "the full soul loatheth the honey-comb; but to the hungry soul every bitter thing is sweet," is sufficient, even as to present enjoyment, to subvert that whole system, and to make the sated epicure envy the neighbouring indigent but healthy cottager.

V. 13—27.

It becomes a Christian to shun all indiscreet connexions and engagements; and especially to stand aloof from those who run themselves into difficulties by extravagant expenses and vicious indulgences. Indeed, few are more lavish in praising their imprudent benefactors; or rather the dupes of their artifices, than these unhappy men are; so long as further supplies are hoped for: but none more severe in their sarcasms and calumnies, when the patience of their friends is exhausted, and they can no longer be imposed on. But, in all cases, we should be very shy of those friends, real or pretended, who are very loud and lavish in their commendations and professions; remembering that the kisses of an enemy are deceitful. And if they do not mean ill, their excessive praise is disgraceful to us, if we show ourselves pleased with it and with them; and exposes us to envy and hatred. But here a distinction will appear, between the man possessed of superficial endowments, and him who has attained unto solid wisdom and piety. The former, when commendations are bestowed, will grasp for more, and often vainly think of extorting them by his exorbitant demands: and he will aspire after the highest places, and become overbearing, in proportion to his popularity or reputation. But the humble Christian will not crowd sail on such a treacherous gale of favour; he will fear, and provide against a storm: he will be more careful to deserve, than to receive commendation: he will yield to those who appear disposed to vie with him, and recede from every pretension which may excite envy or give umbrage. Indeed he will desire to behave in such a manner, as to be a credit and comfort to his friends and family; and to adorn the Gospel, and "by well-doing to put to silence the ignorance of foolish men:" but he will not be a zealous candidate for reputation of any kind. It is enough to pass through life quietly and usefully: we should therefore watch against those malignant passions in ourselves, as well as against their effects in others. We should pray that we may be, and feel thankful if we are, preserved from the grief and disgrace of domestic contests: and we should seek for patience to bear every affliction which the Lord may lay upon us, in a proper manner. Whatever our trials may be, by waiting on our great and gracious Master, we shall find solace and support; and in due time we shall be honoured. In this frame of mind, he who diligently tends his flocks and herds; or takes care of the fig-tree or olive-yard; or is faithful as a servant or labourer, and abides in his calling, because it is the will of God, will be accepted of him in all he does: he will be a useful and respectable member of the community; his real wants will be supplied, and incentives to pride, luxury, and excess will be mercifully withheld; and he will escape manifold snares and temptations to which his superiors are exposed. Nor is it an empty boast, that such a man has a more solid and stable enjoyment of life, than the king upon his throne, or the richest of his subjects: for he hath less uncertainty and anxiety; and fewer fears, cares, and enemies than they. So very vain are earthly possessions, except as they are employed to do good with! The friendship and esteem also, which men in private stations obtain by good behaviour, are far more desirable, than the encomiums and professions that accompany wealth and power. Piety, integrity, and prudence produce reciprocal and sincere affection. Friends, thus united, sharpen one another in every good work; they are cordial, pleasant, and experimental counsellors to each other; they share each other's comforts, and soften each other's sorrows, by tender sympathy. But we might as reasonably expect to fill hell and destruction, till they could hold no more, as to satisfy the heart of man with created good, when nothing but the enjoyment of God himself for ever can fill the capacities and desires of our rational nature. Happy then are they, and only they, who trust in him and love him. But there always have been numbers, who receive no benefit from the greatest mercies, or from afflictions, however sharp and tedious; and who continue the plague and scandal of all ness. As our hearts, by nature, answer to their's exactly, we have the more cause to be thankful, if the Lord hath made us to differ by his grace; and we should pity and pray for those who are yet left to themselves. Finally, let us apply ourselves to the instructive study of human nature; by carefully watching our own hearts; and comparing them with the word of God, and the state of the world and the church around us. Thus we shall learn how to answer every one, and behave to every one, as his character and circumstances require.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVIII. V. 1. Wicked men often appear very courageous: and when they are heated with wine, or excited by resentment, ambition, or other vehement passions, they face danger with great intrepidity: nay, they may have an habitual mechanical courage, so long as reflection is excluded, and the conscience is stupified through ignorance, error, inattention, or excess. Yet when any thing arouses the consciousness of guilt, and the thoughts of a future reckoning, their courage fails, and they become exceedingly timorous: and many of them experience those terrors which they would be ashamed to acknowledge; especially when they are sick, or in solitude. But the upright Christian, whose sins are pardoned, and whose conscience is at peace, is most bold when most cool and reflecting: a sudden alarm may discompose him exceedingly; but let him have time for recollection, faith, and prayer, and his courage gathers strength; and the feeblest true believer will not be finally terrified from his duty, by the frown of a tyrant, or the menace of a fiery furnace, as the examples of the martyrs abundantly show.

V. 2. 'The state of the commonwealth is oftentimes 'changed.' Either many rival princes, whose discordant claims desolate the land by civil wars; or many in quick succession, being cut off by traitors and usurpers, one after another, or removed before any thing can be brought to an establishment. Compare the history of Israel, after the revolt of the ten tribes, with that of Judah under the princes of David's line: and read the history of Asa, Jehoshaphat, Jotham, Hezekiah, and Josiah, as the best comment on the latter part of the verse.

V. 3. Extravagant spendthrifts, who have reduced themselves to poverty, and involved themselves in debt, often make interest to get into places of trust and authority; and then their oppression, (the result of poverty, rapacity, and profusion,) resembles an inundation, which entirely deso-lates the country, and leaves the wretched inhabitants not the least subsistence. In various ways indigent persons obtain opportunities of oppressing the poor; and their extortion is more absolute and unfeeling than that of a richer poor, is like a sweeping rain † which leaveth no food.

4 They † that forsake the law praise the wicked; ‡ but such as keep the law contend with them.

ment: but they that seek the LORD understand all things.

man, who would not think such petty gains worthy his notice, as the needy oppressor stoops to. A succession of indigent governors and officers in remote provinces, who know that their time will be short, and are determined to make the most of it; and who deem themselves secure from justice, by the distance of the place, and the power of bribing high, which they purchase by extortion, often give a melancholy comment on this proverb, and a wretched demonstration of the impolicy and iniquity of preferring such men.
The ancients expressed the sense of this proverb under the fable of two horse-leeches, one full, and the other hungry.
And by two sponges, one wet and the other dry. 'The 'parable comprehends in it a profitable instruction, both
'to princes and people: to princes, that they commit not
'the government of provinces, or places of charge, to in'digent and indebted persons; and to the people, that they 'suffer not their kings to struggle with too much want.'
(Lord Bacon.)

V. 4. Wicked men excuse one another's faults, and extol one another's supposed virtues, in order to keep themselves in countenance, and their own consciences in peace.
But upright men, who want no such apologies, will not make them for others. They would candidly allow of what is good, and make the best of what is dubious: but they cannot call scandalous vices by soft names, nor give those a good character who are evidently wicked; nay, they deem themselves bound to protest against iniquity, and to use all their power to check its progress.

V. 5. Men's unbridled passions and wicked actions pervert their judgments and cloud their understandings, till they "call evil good and good evil:" so that they are not able to know right from wrong, when their own conduct or interest is concerned. But he who seeks the favour, and desires to do the will, of God, will be led into the knowledge of all useful truth. 'They that are true-hearted
'to God, and conscionable in their ways, have so much 'light from God's Spirit, that they know both what they 'should do, and how they should perform it. (Bp. Hall.)
(Marg. Ref.)

V. 6. (Note, xix. 1.) 'A poor man, walking in truth;
'is better than the rich man of a lie,' or, 'a rich liar.'
(Septuagint.)

V. 7. The young man who obeys God, by obeying his parents in all things lawful, shows his wisdom: but he that spends his time and money in feeding gluttons, or feasting epicures, and in riotous living, does what he can to disgrace his father, as well as to show his own folly, and reduce himself to abject misery. (Marg. Ref.)

lates the word, rendered understanding, revenues. On these grounds, therefore, some interpret the latter verse of needy princes being great oppressors. But the original cannot bear this construction, without a needless conjectural amendment. 'A prince that wants understanding, and is a great oppressor, shall shorten his days: but he that hates covetousness shall prolong his days.' (Bp. Patrick.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 17. He that wilfully takes away the life of man, may flee whither he will, but he cannot escape the vengeance of God, nor even the horrors of his accusing conscience.—No one ought to conceal him, or attempt to rescue him from punishment: his life is forfeited; and if he elude the justice of man, he will only the more surely rush into the pit of destruction. The original word for doeth violence, is generally rendered an oppressor: and this proverb may very properly be connected with the preceding. 'If a prince, in his exactions on the poor people, proceed to shed innocent blood, (as Ahab oppressed and murdered Naboth; though he may seem out of the reach of human laws, he shall perish miserably by the judgment of God, and none shall attempt or be able to prevent it.' (Marg. Ref.)

V. 18. (Notes, Ps. cxxv. 5.) 'There is no such way to be safe as to be honest and sincere:—for he that endeavours to preserve himself by fraud and deceit; though he can wind and turn, and hath several shifts, he thinks, to save himself by, yet in one or other of them he shall perish.' (Bp. Patrick.)—The last clause may be rendered, "he shall fall in one of them."

V. 19. (Note, xii. 11.) 'He that tilleth his land shall be satisfied with bread; and he that followeth after vain persons, shall be satisfied with poverty.' The one shall have bread enough; and the other poverty enough. The word is the same in both clauses of the verse.

V. 20. 'He that is true to his word, and just in his dealings, shall have abundance of blessings from God, and be well spoken of by men: but he whose eager desires make him heap up wealth by right or wrong, brings such guilt on himself, as makes him execrable unto both.' (Bp. Patrick.) Faithfulness may also include the due improvement of a man's talents: and the good wishes and fervent prayers of those, whom he thus benefits, may be numbered among his many blessings. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 21. 'All persons do not give bribes: but there is hardly any cause, wherein somewhat may not be found to incline the mind of a judge, if respect of persons lead him. For one man shall be respected as his countryman, another as an ill-tongued man, another as a rich man, another as a favourite, another as commended by a friend. To conclude, all is full of iniquity where respect of persons bears sway, and for a very slight matter, as it were for a bit of bread, judgment is perverted.' (Lord Bacon.) The same is at least equally true and important in the case of ministers. If, instead of the glory of God and the salvation of souls, they are influenced by respect of persons, desire of favour and popularity, or love of filthy lucre; they will be drawn aside from the line of duty by numberless considerations: and none can say to what meanness and baseness they may at length stoop.

V. 22. The avaricious man covets all he sees, grudges all that goes beside him, and all that he expends, and envies every one that is more prosperous than himself. He is not aware how precarious his ill-gotten possessions are; or how soon poverty may come upon him, and he may need help from others, though now so unwilling to bestow it on them. (Note, 20.)

V. 23. We are so prone to self-love and pride, that the most prudent and needful rebukes are apt to create a transient displeasure. Yet upon reflection most men will have a better opinion of a faithful reprover, than of a soothing flatterer, and will show him more favour. They who have the most frequently made the trial, will have the fullest experimental evidence of the truth of this maxim.

V. 24. Young people often consider themselves as, in some sense, owners of their parents' substance, and scruple not to appropriate whatever they can lay hands on. Thus they "rob their parents, and say, it is no transgression;" whereas it is a robbery that adds ingratitude, disrespect, and disobedience to injustice, and which initiates numbers into those expensive courses, by which they at length are led to join the more infamous depredators and murderers, and so they rush forward to destruction, temporal and eternal.

V. 25. The words rendered a proud heart, signify large in mind; and the ambitious, who are actuated by vast desires and expectations of power, honour, and pre-eminence, and who are the great disturbers of mankind in public and private life, seem especially intended. 'A man of a proud and insolent spirit, of ambitious and vast desires, is never quiet. He lives in perpetual quarrels, suits, and contentions. But he, who, confiding in the Almighty, hath a humble and contented mind, lives peaceably and comfortably ; nay, thrives many times, and abounds in plenty of all good things.' (Bp. Patrick.) This largeness of mind, or vastness of desires, differs widely from Solomon's largeness of heart, or vast capacity : even as a humble contented mind differs from a weak capacity, or a base and grovelling spirit.

V. 26. When a man has that confidence in his own good understanding, intentions, and dispositions, that he fears no deception ; and is fully satisfied that he shall act up to the purposes which he hath formed under conviction, or in sickness and danger ; he proves himself to be very ignorant and foolish. He does not consider how differently he will be affected, when in health and safety, and under temptations, from what he was in contrary circumstances ; he trusts the worst of all deceivers, which hath cheated him a thousand times ; and he might as well expect that the sea would be always calm, the water always frozen, or the wind always west, because they are sometimes so. But he who walks wisely or circumspectly, distrusts himself, trusts in the Lord, shuns temptation, and prays continually to be upheld by the grace of God : and thus he will be delivered from those snares in which the other is entangled. A man's confidence in his own capacity and ability, for success in any undertaking, is implied in the general expression of trusting his own heart : but the inspired writer's strong and decided language, no doubt was intended to convey a more general and spiritual instruction.

V. 27. (Marg. Ref.) The selfish man not only refuses to look out for objects of compassion, but he turns away from those that force themselves on his attention. But he thus exposes himself to the ill wishes of great numbers, and brings himself under the curse of God, in every thing he does or possesses.

V. 28. (Note, 12.) ' In the places of the impious, the righteous groan : but by their destruction the righteous are multiplied.' (Sept.) ' Some are imprisoned, and sent into obscurity, by the unjust prosecution of the wicked ; and others obscure themselves, and groan under those oppressions, till there be a turn of affairs, by the fall of these wretched persons and the preferment of better :
 which invites virtuous men to appear again, and by the countenance they then receive, to propagate piety among the people. There is no blessing we should pray for so earnestly as this, especially when the days are evil.' (Bp.
Patrick.)

 ceal an aching trembling heart under the affectation of great composure. But if at sometimes they are ready to trem-

" pursueth," how will their hands be strong, or their hearts endure, when the almighty Judge shall pursue them with his dreadful vengeance ? This terror will be unspeakably more insupportable, than the dread of them has been to their inferiors and vassals. And yet some of them, who have risen to authority, have been more cruel and terrible than the most savage beasts ; and to their own subjects especially, as if ambitious to let all the world know that they wanted understanding, as much as equity ! Many of them have been inhuman oppressors and sanguinary persecutors, who have cut off by cruel deaths numbers of their people, and driven the wisest and best of them into exile, or obscurity ; constraining them to hide themselves, that they might escape with their lives, and not do violence to their consciences ; and employing their scanty ingenuity to render others miserable, and themselves odious and execrated. When nations provoke the Lord by their transgressions, he sends them many such tyrants, as competitors or successors to each other, who, by their fierce contests and implacable resentments, their bloody executions and greedy extortions, are more fatal than earthquakes, pestilences, or the beasts of the field ; and who themselves seem to be made only to be taken and destroyed, as nuisances to society. But when the Lord hath blessings in store for any people, he raises up a man of understanding, who loves justice and hates covetousness to rule over them ;
 and thus he both prolongs his own days, and the peaceful estate of the land. Under a ruler of this character, the righteous rejoice and increase, and great honour and prosperity may be expected. For such rulers then we ought to pray :
 and having obtained our request we cannot be too thankful :
 and every one, according to the duties of his station, should endeavour to check the progress of impiety, and promote national reformation, that we may not forfeit these valuable blessings. But the rich are not the only, nor the most grievous, oppressors : in various ways the poor are more hateful and intolerable. Necessitous and unprincipled men often intrude into the magistracy, or into offices connected with the collection, or expenditure, of the public treasure ; and when it comes in their way they squeeze the poor without mercy or shame. It is, however, evident, that numbers are not at all aware of their guilt and danger ; but are either insensible through ignorance, or presumptuous through a form of godliness. Though they turn away their ears from hearing the law ; yet they contend for the doctrines of the Gospel : they hope to be saved from hell by grace and faith, though they are not saved from sin, and this present evil world. They also attend on ordinances, and make many and long prayers, though they neglect justice, truth, and mercy : but such prayers are an abomination to the Lord ; for they never heartily pray to be delivered from hypocrisy, covetousness, and the love of the world, or to have the law of God written in their hearts. Yet, alas ! there are such numbers who agree in 6 M

CHAP. XXIX.

Miscellaneous maxims, concerning a man being hardened against reproof; and of good government, wisdom, and forsaking the law, and in excusing and commending each other; and they meet with so many teachers of their own stamp, that they keep themselves and one another in heart and countenance: and they verily conclude, that all else in religion is needlessly strict and scrupulous. So that when such as regard the whole word of God (and conscientiously keep the commandments, and walk uprightly, as well as believe the promises, and trust the mercy of God through Christ for salvation,) attempt to contend with them, and argue, that "without holiness no man shall see the Lord;" they treat all their warnings with supercilious contempt, as the result of ignorance, bigotry, and a narrow mind. Especially they who are rich, or grow rich in this course, become wise in their own conceits; so that "there is more hope of a fool than of them." And they despise the poor, especially when these being men of understanding, search them out, and detect their hypocrisy and delusion. For "evil men understand not judgment:" their lusts blind them, and God gives them up to strong delusions, to believe a lie: so that they mistake hardness of heart, vain confidence, and carnal security, for gracious assurance and holy boldness. Whilst the established believer, trusting in the Lord, and walking in the path of duty, fears no enemy or danger: but fears always lest he should be deceived by his own heart, to dishonour God and commit iniquity; these self-deceivers treat all tenderness of conscience and all jealousy of themselves, as want or weakness of faith, or remains of a self-righteous spirit; and thus they harden their hearts against fear of every kind, till they fall into mischief. But true piety begins and proceeds in deep humility. The poor in spirit do not palliate or cover their sins: but they humbly confess and forsake them, hoping thus to find mercy. They are not wise in their own conceits: but seek to the Lord to be their Teacher, and are glad to be set right by the poorest man who can point out any mistake, into which they have fallen; and this proves their best security against delusion, and the best method of obtaining well-grounded assurance. They neither refuse to learn and obey the commands of God; nor yet trust in their imperfect services. They do not live in conscious iniquity, and then cloak it with a form of godliness. They aim to walk uprightly; yet they dare not trust in their own deceitful hearts, but continually seek to the Lord to uphold them, and to preserve them from, or to render them victorious over, temptation. They may be seduced by plausible deceivers, to go astray in an evil way; and even their diffidence of themselves, and their unsuspecting candour, will sometimes thus expose them: but on reflection and examination, they recover themselves from the snare. They learn to beware of covetousness, and prefer poverty with uprightness to being rich and perverse: being aware that they who by injury and unjust gain, increase their substance, have no other advantage but the toil, and anxiety of gathering wealth, for the use of those, "that will pity the poor." Yet by the blessing of God they know no want, but are often able to assist their relatives and friends; while such as affect to despise them, are the disgrace and ruin of those whom they are most bound to comfort, and become themselves, even in this world, abject and miserable: nay, some of this character, both in high and low life, pursuing their ambitious, rapacious, and debauched courses, are led to do violence to the lives of their neighbours, and so hasten their deserved, ignominious, and almost unpitied destruction.

V. 18—28.

In every rank and state of life, upright conduct is immensely the most safe and advantageous: though the crafty and designing are sanguine in promising themselves and each other, the most brilliant successes. But the upright not only shun injustice and violence: they also learn faithfulness; and "a faithful man shall abound with blessings." They have mercy on the poor, according to the Lord's mercy to them: and, giving to them without grudging, they shall not lack, but shall have good things in possession. For instead of following after vain persons, and growing poor by profuseness; they are frugal, and industrious in tilling the land, or in other honest labour; and thus have plenty of bread, and are therewith content. When young persons enter upon such a pious and prudent medium, they become the credit and comfort of their parents. But, alas! many prefer being the companions of vicious men, to their shame and grief: their excesses tempt them to rob their parents and waste their substance; then they often associate with robbers and destroyers; they spend their lives in fear and horror, and sometimes end them in ignominy. Nor should it pass unnoticed, how frequently we are cautioned against covetousness. "He that hasteth to be rich shall not be innocent." Some, as magistrates, having respect of persons, often become so mean, as to sell their iniquitous services, and commit the most atrocious crimes, at the lowest price. Others, as ministers, for the sake of filthy lucre, betray their trust, show respect of persons, forsake the law, praise the wicked, flatter with their tongues, cause the righteous to go astray in an evil way, and murder the souls of men. In every situation, the avicious is sure to have an evil eye, to envy such as are more prosperous, to grudge what goes beside him; to use unjust or unmerciful ways of increasing his substance; and instead of giving liberally to the poor, (the best security against want;) to hide his eyes and harden his heart, that their misery and complaints may not prevail with him to lessen his idolized hoard. But what will be the end of these covetous practices, and of these "children of a curse, who go astray in the way of Balaam, loving the wages of unrighteousness?" Alas! they know not what poverty will come upon them here; and eternal poverty, without one drop of water to cool the tongue, will be their portion, if they die impenitent: while they will have many a curse for their unmercifulness and rapacity. Others growing “proud in heart, and ambitious of distinctions even in the “church,” stir up strifes, and become fierce disputers about forms and notions. Instead of walking circumspectly in a path bestrewed with snares, and beset with enemies; they confide in the traitor in their own bosom, and walk on heedlessly, till they fall at once, and there is no remedy. From these snares may the Lord deliver us! Let us watch and pray against temptation: let us not be high-minded, but fear: let us examine ourselves, and beg of God to examine us; and to teach us so to seek him, that we may understand all things pertaining to our hope and our walk. Let us learn to value the faithful reprovder, and encourage and imitate his faithfulness; and to shun the fascinating poison of the flatterer, determined neither to listen to his words, nor to learn his ways. And may the Lord give us and ours a believing upright heart, and a peaceful conscience; that we may have confidence in him, and be bold as a lion through the trials of life, at the approach of death, and in the prospect of the day of judgment: and let us never forget to pray, that the nation, and all nations, may be governed by such rulers, as encourage every honest attempt to increase the number of the righteous.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIX. V. 1. “The man of reproofs,” (whom men have often warned and counselled, and whom God has repeatedly corrected, but without producing any abiding amendment;) who still continues obstinate and rebellious, as the oxen that will not submit to the yoke, but stiffen their necks against it; will unexpectedly be overtaken by divine judgments, from which there can be no escape or deliverance. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2. This is ‘a tacit admonition unto princes to be good, by describing the happiness which a nation then enjoys.’ (Bp. Patrick.) (Notes, xi. 10. xxviii. 12. 23.)

V. 3. (Marg. Ref. Notes, xxiii. 24, 25. xxviii. 7. 19.) “Feedeth harlots.” (Old Trans.)

V. 4. (Marg. Ref.) “A man of oblations.” (Marg.) The word always signifies, throughout the whole Bible, the heave-offerings which were offered to God; which would make one think, that here it signified a prince that is sacrilegious. Or, if we do not take it in that strict sense, it denotes one that will suffer himself to be pacified by gifts, and bribed to wink at the most enormous crimes:—or, that is so unjust as to find fault perhaps with the most innocent persons, on purpose that they may appease him by offering a part of their estate to ‘save all the rest.’ (Bp. Patrick.) May not the man of oblations be a prince, who acts as if he were a deity or had no superior, but possessed power to dispense even with the divine laws, and pardon the crimes which God required him to punish; provided the criminals would make atonement to him by large oblations?

V. 5. Flatterers often aim to inveigle men, by their deceitful commendations, to consent to some proposal which entangles them in difficulties, or to seduce them into sinful compliances. But if they have no such intentions, their encomiums and professions tend to put men off their guard, and to betray them into some foolish and prejudicial conduct, which brings them into great trouble and distress, if they be not finally ruined by it.

V. 6. The designing villain is often ensnared by his own transgression, and ruined by the consequences of his own iniquitous conduct; which causes the righteous to rejoice, in praising and adoring the just judgments of God; as well as in giving thanks for their own preservation, and for having been led in the paths of peace and safety.

V. 7. This has a special reference to the conduct of righteous magistrates, who bestow pains to examine into the causes of the poor, as being most exposed to oppression, and least able to redress themselves; whilst wicked and selfish magistrates disregard those by whom nothing is to be gained. ‘They are bound in conscience to search into the truth of things; not to be sparing of their pains, —to find out the bottom of a business; which he that refuses to do, may, perhaps rejects the complaint of the poor, or beats them off with big words; or out of the hardness of his heart, or the love of ease, or fear of great men, or any other respect, will not give them audience, or not consider and redress their grievance; Solomon pronounces a wicked person.’ (Bp. Patrick.) But the maxim is equally applicable to the compassionate attention of pious men to the distresses of the poor: and the unfeeling disregard to them which is often shown by the wicked, nay, sometimes by such as would be thought religious.

V. 8. ‘Men of scorn,’ (Hebrew) ‘signifies such as mock at religion, and at all things that are serious.’ (Bp. Patrick.) Persons of this description, more than any other kind of wicked or foolish men, seem framed for the ruin of nations; especially when they possess influence or authority: for they lead the people further and further into wickedness and impiety, and ripen communities for divine judgments; and then by their selfish, rash, or infatuated schemes, they help to bring those judgments upon them;

except as the wise and pious avert the wrath of God, by their prayers and zealous endeavours to promote religion; and to counteract the tendency of such pernicious measures.

V. 9. If a wise man inadvertently engage in any sort of contest or dispute with a conceited and empty wrangler; he will be sure to be treated, either with furious anger or with ridicule, in return for his most conclusive arguments. And whether the fool rage or deride, it will be equally uneasy to his opponent; who will find it very difficult to extricate himself with credit and comfort.

V. 10. Men of blood hate those upright rulers who are a terror to them; and they hate the image of God in his servants (as Cain hated, envied, and slew his brother, and as the Jews hated and crucified Christ.) But the righteous seek and pray for the salvation even of those who thirst for their blood: or the righteous seek to defend the lives of their persecuted brethren, and of their upright rulers, against the machinations of the blood-thirsty.

V. 11. The word translated mind, has different meanings, according to which different interpretations are given of the proverb. 'A fool shows all his anger immediately: but a wise man keeps it in till he has a fitting opportunity to express it most to the purpose.' 'A fool blurts out every thing that comes into his head: but a wise man speaks only as much as is necessary.' 'A fool utters all he knows: but a wise man conceals many things.' (Bp. Patrick.) The heat and vehemence of spirit, with which inconsiderate and rash men dispute and conduct affairs; as contrasted with the calmness, discretion, and caution of those who are eminently wise, seems especially meant. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12. When flatterers, slanderers, and false teachers are encouraged by the prince, good men either retire, or are driven from employment under him; so that all affairs come into the management of the most unprincipled and mercenary wretches in the nation, to the irreparable disgrace and detriment of both prince and people.

V. 13. (Note, xxii. 22.) The debtor and the usurer; the poor and those who defraud and oppress them, live together in the world, and the Lord preserves the lives of them both: he gives them the light of the sun, and the blessings of providence: he affords them the light of his word; and he sometimes calls a rich Zaccheus, as well as a poor Lazarus, to be enlightened with the light of life.

his authority in defending the poor and needy from oppression and wrong, takes the best method of establishing his throne during his own life, and of perpetuating the regal authority in his family to future generations. This is especially selected as the character of a good king; because in this he most resembles and imitates the King of kings and Lord of lords. (Marg. Ref. Note, xx. 28.)

V. 15. The mother, &c. The mother is supposed to have the immediate care of the child, during those tender years in which correction is most seasonable and salutary. But mothers are apt to be over-indulgent; and when children are left to themselves to contract bad habits, and to grow obstinate in vice, they become a disgrace to them. (Notes, x. 1. xlii. 24. xxii. 15. xxiii. 13, 14.)

V. 16. When wicked men live together in great numbers, they corrupt and embolden each other in wickedness; they whet each other's ingenuity, and grow more shameless or artful in their crimes. Hence it is that populous cities are almost always more full of daring impiety and iniquity, than country villages. 'When the wicked grow numerous by growing great, wickedness increases by having authority on its side: but let not the righteous hereby be discouraged; for the wicked men are the shorter in their reign; and they that preserve their virtue shall have the pleasure to behold their downfall.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 17. (Note, 15.) The love of ease, and fear of being discomposed or put out of temper, induce many to neglect the correction of their children: but this little interruption of their rest, if submitted to as a self-denying duty, and in dependence on the aid and blessing of God, generally prevents a more durable and distressing disquietude, even that of witnessing or hearing of their evil courses when grown up; and makes way for much peace and comfort, when the correction is the blessed means of their becoming worthy and useful persons. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 18. Where the light of Revelation has not reached, the people live in ignorance and ungodliness, and perish in their sins. The Bible and faithful teachers are therefore great mercies: yet men should not deceive themselves, by being hearers only, without being also doers of the word; for "he that keepeth the law, happy is he." At the same time this maxim points out those who have no scriptural instruction, as the objects of deep compassion; and inculcates the duty of sending missions, forwarding every design for the instruction of the ignorant, and praying for an increase of faithful labourers, in every part of the vineyard and of the world.

V. 19. 'A wicked servant.' (Sept.) 'He that is of a servile and rebellious nature.' The servants were generally in those days the property of their masters, who had, under certain restrictions, the power of correcting them: and many would be found, who could not be governed by lenient measures, but would grow more perverse, negligent, sullen, and refractory, under reproofs: so that, in some cases, the most humane master might be constrained to use more rigorous methods, and be justified in using them, as far as he kept within the limits of the law of God.

V. 20. (Note, xxvi. 22.) When a man is so full of self-conceit and presumption, that he will neither take counsel nor warning; but will rashly speak whatever pride, vanity, or passion may suggest: when he is forward to speak before his superiors, or before he has taken time to consider the subject: when he is rash and dogmatical, and disputatious upon the deepest mysteries, without due reverence or reflection; there is more hope of the most ignorant and profligate than of him.

V. 21. When a servant, born in a man's house, was treated with indulgent fondness, and not inured to labour or obedience, because he happened to be a comely or witty child, it would tend to make him unfit for service, and negligent in his business: thus he would become useless and uncomfortable, insolent and ungovernable, and expect to be treated like a child of the family. Good usage, as a servant, does not imply that indulgence which would ruin a child.

V. 22. (Notes, xv. 18. xvii. 19.)

V. 23. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 24. The man, who is a partner in any fraud or theft, or receiveth stolen goods, is not only as bad as the thief; but, being likely to be called upon as a witness, and to be put upon his oath to declare all he knows, he will probably perjure himself rather than discover his accomplices; and so bring wrath upon his soul on another account. When the Israelites were put upon their oath, the judge adjured them in the name and presence of God to declare the truth, as they would escape his awful curse. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 25, 26. (Marg. Ref.) The fear of man, in a variety of ways, proves an ensnaring temptation. Numbers, fearing reproach, are ashamed of Christ and his cause. In persecution many, through fear of man, apostatize; and others neglect their bounden duties, and forsake the ordinances of God. Some, having committed one crime, from the fear of man add others to conceal it. Even Christians, from fear of their brethren, who differ from them, are tempted to dissemble, and draw others into dissimulation: and ministers, from the fear of censure, or unpopularity, too often consult the inclinations of the people, and of some leading men, or powerful friend, more than the sacred oracles. They shun to declare the whole counsel of God, take to themselves the merit of being prudent, and censure their more faithful brethren. Nay, masters of families are often so afraid even of their servants and children, that having long neglected family-worship, they dare not set about it, even when convinced that it is their duty. But no enumeration can reach the tenth of the cases, in which the fear of man, proving stronger than the fear of God, draws in persons of almost every character, to commit sin, or neglect duty: yet confidence in God preserves the established believer from this temptation, or enables him to overcome it, and secures him in every situation. The marginal references point out a few instances, from that of Abraham denying his wife, to that of Peter dissembling at Antioch. But this temptation would in many cases lose much of its force, were it well considered, that while many seek the ruler's favour, "every man's judgment is of the LORD." 'What God hath appointed that shall come to him.'

V. 27. There is not only a contrariety of character, but a mutual antipathy, betwixt the righteous and the wicked, proportioned to the degree of their holiness or wickedness. They are an abomination to each other. But whilst the wicked hate the persons, as well as the characters and company, of the righteous; the righteous abhor the conduct, yet pity and pray for the persons, of the wicked.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-14.

It is an unspeakable advantage to any people, when the righteous are invested with authority, and for it we all are

b. xxiv. 9. Ps. cxix. 115. 27 An unjust man is an abomination bound to pray, or to bless the Lord : but the advancement of the wicked, however eminent for genius, capacity, and splendid achievements, should be deprecated or deplored, as a public calamity, as one of the heaviest judgments inflicted on nations by an offended God. The magistrate, whether the king as supreme, or one in authority under him, if he rule in judgment, establishes the land : but rulers, who are influenced by bribes, or by lies, ruin the state, and corrupt the mass of the people, by their pestilential influence, example, and the fatal effects of their own misconduct. We cannot but be aware, that scornful men, whose hearts are hardened in profane mockery of God and religion, will despise remarks of this kind ; yet, let them look well to it ; for while they bring cities and nations into a snare, "the devil takes them captive at his will." They will, no doubt, not only despise the words of God's ministers ; but secretly hate and perhaps ridicule those princes who faithfully judge and protect the poor. But the king of Zion, whose "throne is established for ever," will protect and bless those who copy his example, and frown into destruction all those who are enemies to them and to Him. Indeed the upright Christian, in every situation, must expect to be hated by the blood-thirsty, the fraudulent, and such as perjure themselves for gain : but they have the affectionate prayers of the righteous in their behalf, who seek the preservation of their lives and the salvation of their souls. But whilst various means are used to repress iniquity, and wicked men are warned and corrected that they may be reclaimed ; there are still vast numbers, who, having been often reprov'd, so harden themselves in obstinate wickedness, and in contemptuous or stubborn defiance of all authority, that they must be cut off by condign punishment, for an example to others. The word of God likewise warns us all to flee from the wrath to come, to the hope set before us in Jesus Christ. Yet many, who are thus repeatedly reprov'd and invited, sin against the light, and against their own consciences, and grow more daring and impudent in wickedness ; till they suddenly perish, and that without remedy. For in the transgression of the wicked there is a snare, as birds are caught in a net ; and when the snare is drawn, they can by no means disentangle themselves. The flatterer also, as Satan's coadjutor, spreads his net for our feet. The pride of our hearts first disposes us to flatter ourselves, and to admire our own fancied excellencies, and to excuse our crimes as foibles : but being sometimes hard put to it, to keep up this good opinion of ourselves when we are conscious of so much evil, we are apt to look out for other witnesses to confirm us in it ; and we are prepared to pay them in kind, or in some other way, for this favourable testimony. This disposition of the heart prepares us for flattery : and some will persuade men to conclude their state good, though they have no scriptural evidence of it. Some magnify the merits of a man's generous virtues and noble mind, and represent heaven as his just reward ; and extenuate the evil of the grossest crimes, as mere trifles, for which none but uncharitable fanatics can suppose that God will condemn them to everlasting punishment. Thus men are caught in the net, and live upon tolerable terms to the just : and he that is upright in the way, is abomination to the wicked.

with their consciences, and grow secure in presumptuous wickedness : till too late, they find that there is a hell, and that there is no getting out of it. These, and such like flatterers often spread their nets from pulpits : they speak smooth things, and prophesy deceit ; and the people love to have it so, especially the rich and great : the sermon is very comfortable, the hearers are well pleased with themselves and with the preacher ; they flatter him in return, and spread a net for his feet, and reward him with more substantial emoluments, till Satan takes the whole company in his snare. Even when flattery does not proceed so far, it feeds a man's vanity, makes him venture on employments for which he is unqualified ; leads him into temptations, exposes him to reproofs and corrections, and precludes his progress and improvement. "He that loveth wisdom, while he rejoiceth his father," if living ; not only shuns the company and intimacy of profligate men and women : but he takes care, not to engage in any contest with foolish and unprincipled persons ; knowing, that whatever means are used, or however their profane scorn or indignant rage may predominate, there can be no comfort in such litigations, and no credit in victory, though much disgrace if baffled in them. Whilst the fool uttereth all his mind, however it may injure or exasperate others, or expose himself, the wise man will keep it in till afterwards, and will be careful not to be rash and hasty in his words ; especially not to decide presumptuously of the deep things of God, which is an arrogance of the most provoking nature. The true believer also will seek the salvation of those who hate him, or even thirst for his blood : and he will not only be kind to the poor, but bear with the deceitful, as his heavenly Father causes his sun to shine and his rain to descend upon them. Far from being induced by avarice to associate with thieves and cheats ; he will be indifferent about worldly interests, and take pleasure in considering the cause of the poor, and in relieving their distress which the wicked disregard and increase. Thus in one view we may perceive, that when rulers are wicked, and hearken to flattery and lies, all their servants are wicked also : then the ungodly are multiplied, and transgression increaseth ; and the righteous are had in abomination, whilst they grieve over and abhor the iniquity they witness but cannot heal. But whilst scorers thus bring the city into a snare, the despised remnant of the righteous often turn away the wrath of God, and prevent national judgments. For, however men may deceive themselves, the wise and righteous alone have present satisfaction, and they alone shall have everlasting honour and felicity.

—o—
 Fallen man is so prone to do evil, that from the earliest youth there will be very many things in his conduct to be blamed ; and as the faculties unfold, his sinful propensities gather strength, and produce their effects more and more. Our aim therefore should be, by every proper means, to counteract this tendency of corrupt nature : and thus it may be said with propriety, that "the rod and reproof give wisdom." For, rebukes and corrections, properly admi-

CHAP. XXX.

The title, 1. Agur's confession of sin and ignorance; his inquiry after God, and his caution about the word of God; and his prayer to be delivered from vanity and lies, and from the temptations of wealth and poverty, 2—9. A caution against accusing servants, and concerning four sorts of wicked persons, 10—14. Four things insatiable, 15, 16. The punishment of those who mock their parents, 17. Four things wonderful, and not to be traced out, 18—20. Four things exceedingly troublesome, 21—23. Four things small, but wise, 24—28.

nistered, check the luxuriant growth of evil dispositions, and inure the will and passions to subjection. But when a child is left to himself, and humoured in his wayward inclinations, he grows more self-willed and untractable daily, and his passions demand still further gratifications; till keeping company with harlots, or running into other excesses, he both wastes the substance of his parents, and brings a reproach upon them for improperly educating him. If we then would have our children yield satisfaction to our hearts, we must give them proper correction and instruction. Indulgence as well as severity is indeed an extreme, which must be avoided. Whilst servants and inferiors should be treated with great humanity and equity; it is a real injury to them, to bring them up delicately, to disuse them from labour, and to habituate them to a mode of living unsuitable to their station: for this tends to render them wretched, when constrained to return to their former occupations, or to tempt them sinfully to desert them. So that an over-fondness should not be indulged towards any individual; at least unless the person means to provide for him, according to that way of living to which he is thus accustomed. Nay, this counteracts its own end, and instead of rendering those, who are thus peculiarly favoured, more attentive and obliging; it naturally serves to make them imperious, assuming, and untractable; and thus uneasy to those who have spoiled them, and unfit for every other person. Indeed such perverseness is in man, that it is found impossible to persist in that gentleness which is in itself desirable. There are too many, who grow heedless and indolent, when only spoken to with mildness; and sullen and refractory, when reproved with sharpness; so that though they understand, they will not answer, but will do every thing contrary to what is desired! This same perverseness carried to a greater excess, renders prisons and other punishments necessary, because numbers cannot otherwise be dealt with. Both masters and servants, however, may be thankful, that the one is delivered from the trouble and the temptation, and the other from the oppression, which results from the power of punishment being intrusted to private persons: and in our circumstances, we may so behave to our servants, that discharging them from our families may be a sufficient punishment for ordinary misdemeanors; and in grosser offences, the civil magistrate may be applied to. While we should be thankful, that we inhabit "the valley of vision," and have abundant means of instruction; and while we pity, and pray for, and try to help, as we are able, such as are not so highly favoured: let us not forget, that if we neglect the great salvation of the Gospel, or pretend to value it, when we refuse to obey any of God's commandments, we shall perish with deeper aggravation, than even the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah. We have, therefore, greater reason to watch against the treachery of our hearts: and especially against every kind of pride and self-sufficiency. For this, above all things, tends to bring a man low: but honour, and He who is the true Fountain of honour, upholds the humble in spirit. Again, as the fear of man bringeth a snare; we should be instant in prayer, that we be not thus entangled. This we shall easily be, if we forget that every man's judgment, and the determination of his lot, cometh of the Lord: and therefore many seek the ruler's favour, and fear his frown, instead of humbly trusting in God, who has all hearts in his hand; nay, we are prone to dread the reproach or contempt of the poor and mean: so that many dare not profess what they believe to be true, nor seek truth where they sometimes think it might be found; nor perform their known duty, and relinquish the vanities of the world; nor act up to their own judgment and consciences; for fear of being talked about, pointed at, derided, reviled, hated, or persecuted, or of losing the favour of this or the other friend: thus they are ashamed to own Christ now, and if they persist in this course, he will be ashamed of them at the day of judgment. But he, who trusteth in the Lord will be saved. Depending on his mercy, grace, and providence, he will boldly keep his commandments, and in so doing find true happiness, and a sure refuge. We must also remember, that "the friendship of the world is enmity with God;" and that the wicked abhor the righteous: we should lay our account with the enmity of the ungodly, and never court their friendship: yet, we should seek to do them all the good we can; and while angry men stir up strife and abound in transgression, we should persist in "following after peace:" and holiness, without which no man shall see the "Lord."

NOTES.

CHAP. XXX. V. 1. These last two chapters form an appendix to the book of Proverbs, it is probable, annexed to it by the men of Hezekiah. It may be supposed that the names of Agur and Jakeh his father were well known in Israel at that time. The expression, "The prophecy," or the burden, seems to imply, that these instructions were communicated to the church as a divine revelation; and their claim has been very long allowed of. Agur "spake unto Ithiel, and unto Ucal." The word Ithiel signifies, "God with me," and Ucal, "a mighty one!" (literally I shall be able;) and some have thought that they referred more to the subject of Agur's prophecy, than to the persons whom he addressed. But it is the more common opinion, that they were Agur's disciples or pupils; who had proposed some questions to him, which he answered as follows:—The notion that Solomon was meant under the name Agur, though held by some of the fathers, is now generally given up.

2 Surely b I am more c brutish than any man, and have not the understanding of a man.

3 I d neither learned wisdom, e nor
* have the knowledge of f the holy.

V. 2, 3. Agur, though consulted by others, was far from deeming himself competent to instruct them: nay, his acquaintance with his own heart, his conflict with his evil propensities, and his frequent deep thoughts upon the mysteries of religion, which he could not properly explore or apprehend, made him ready to think that "surely he" was more brutish than any man, and had not the understanding of a man. He had learned a little of his own ignorance; but he could not pretend to any proficiency in wisdom, in the knowledge of the Holy One, and of those holy things which relate to him. The last clause may be rendered interrogatively, "Shall I know the knowledge of 'holy things?'" Perhaps he meant, that neither his natural endowments, nor any advantages of his education, tended to qualify him for a teacher. If then he was enabled to communicate any useful instruction, the whole honour of it belonged to God alone. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4. This may refer to the preceding verses. Man's study and investigation cannot find out God; nor can he comprehend him in his narrow mind. No one hath ascended into heaven to obtain information on these mysterious subjects: nor hath any one descended from heaven to bring intelligence concerning them. None could emulate, or even comprehend, the works of Him, "who hath gathered the wind in his fists," &c. If there were or ever had been such a person, who was he? and who could claim his descent from him? Thus the inquiry is generally interpreted. Yet it seems to me a prophetic intimation of Him, who came down from heaven to be our instructor and Saviour, and then ascended into heaven to be our Advocate; who as One with the Father, created and upholds all things; who was known in some measure to the ancient church, as JEHOVAH, I AM, and as the only begotten Son of God, (Psalms ii. 7;) and from whom alone the knowledge of God can be obtained. The name of the great Creator, as manifested through his Son, seems to be inquired after: and who is that wise and happy man that has obtained this knowledge? (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5, 6. (Note, Psalm xii. 6.) The understanding of divine truth is not to be obtained by curious speculations, but by regarding the word of God, which is "sure and maketh wise the simple:" and nothing must be added to it under pretence of infallibility, authority of fathers and councils, traditions of the elders, reasonings of philosophers, or dreams of enthusiasts. In this manner heresies and false religions of various kinds, are introduced and supported. But they, who palm their own inventions upon

5 Every e word of God is f pure: he is a g shield unto them that put their trust in him.

6 a Add thou not unto his words lest he reprove thee, b and thou be found a liar.

mankind, as of equal authority with the word of God, will be found liars of the worst kind, both deceivers and deceived; and may expect to be severely punished for their temerity or presumption. This caution is worthy of their notice, who are continually wanting to alter and amend, (as they call it,) the text of the Scriptures by conjectural criticism; which generally adds a new clause to God's word, instead of the old one that is expunged, either as unintelligible, or as inconsistent with the critic's favourite system. Paraphrasts should also be cautious what words they insert to make out the meaning of difficult passages, and to render them consistent with their favourite schemes. And great humility and modesty are requisite, in order to explain and apply the Scriptures, especially the more mysterious and controverted passages; lest we should seem to add any thing to the words of God, as of equal authority with them: and so be found guilty of forging scripture, and counterfeiting the name of God; saying, "Thus saith the LORD; although he hath not spoken." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7—9. Agur's mind was fixed upon the Lord, though he did not immediately mention him. He especially desired two things to be granted him before, or until, his death, as the context seems to imply: the one relates directly to spiritual blessings; "Remove far from me 'vanity, and lies;'" that is "Deliver me entirely from 'guilt and sin; from idolatry, error, delusion, and temptation, and from having the vanities of the world for my 'portion.' The other relates to temporal things, yet in subserviency to heavenly. Agur prayed against both poverty and riches, not so much because of the hardships of the one and the anxious encumbrances of the other, as because of the temptations to which they would severally expose him. If he lived in great affluence, he feared lest he should grow self-indulgent and forgetful of God; and so at length be induced to deny his over-ruling providence, his authority, or even his existence, saying, like Pharaoh, "Who is the LORD?" If he were reduced to extreme poverty, he feared lest he should be tempted to dishonesty, and then to perjury, in order to prevent detection and punishment; or, as some interpret it, to murmur against God, and through impatience to speak impious words of him. He therefore wisely prayed for a mediocrity, that he might be kept at a distance from these temptations: he asked food convenient for him; "daily bread," suited to his station, his family, and his real good. There is a remarkable coincidence betwixt this prayer and several clauses of the Lord's prayer.

V. 10. "Hurt not a servant to his master with thy tongue. Do not abuse any poor slave, whose condition is wretched enough. Rather excuse than aggravate his fault to his master, who perhaps is too rigorous: and be sure never to load him with unjust accusations; lest being wronged by thee, and not knowing how to right himself, he appeal to the Lord, and pray him to punish thee, and thou, being found guilty, feel the heavy effects of his vengeance." (Bp. Patrick.) By accusing a servant to his master, (even without direct slander,) in an officious manner, and a trivial concern, great injustice may be done to his character and future comfort, and a strong temptation thrown in his way to commit sin, by yielding to anger, and uttering grievous imprecations. This is, no doubt, peculiarly the case in respect of slaves; but not exclusively: and if a man have not a substantial reason for speaking disadvantageously of another, especially of an inferior to his superior, he has always a good reason for being silent. The lenient side is generally best: and intermeddling in other men's family concerns, especially to make mischief, is always odious and contemptible. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11-14. Some commentators suppose all the several parts of this chapter to be the answers of Agur to the questions of Ithiel and Ucal; and that these verses especially point out four odious, but too common characters, whom he cautioned them to stand aloof from. These are called generations, because they are found through successive ages, as if descended from those predecessors whom they resemble; or because they associate together, as if they belonged to the same family. They are branded as hateful and dangerous persons, whose crimes must be shunned, and of whom all should beware. In every age there are monsters of ingratitude, who, instead of requiting and praying for their parents, curse them, wish them dead, or otherwise abuse them; either from resentment of rebukes, contempt of authority, impatience of restraint, or avidity of their substance. There are also from age to age a multitude of people, who, by one pretence or other, persuade themselves that they are holy persons, the favourites of God, and the heirs of heaven; whose hearts are yet full of the prevailing pollution of iniquity, and who practise much secret wickedness, and so are filthy in the sight of their heart-searching Judge.—Another company is found in every age, who are full of self-importance; whose haughtiness and arrogance are conspicuous in their looks, who are purse-proud, or vain of their birth, rank, accomplishments, or decorations; and who in a stately manner show their supercilious contempt of all around them. There have also been in every age a number of rapacious and cruel extortioners, who devour the poor and needy, to increase their wealth, or to support the expense of their riotous living. These being worse than any savage beasts that are known of, must be described as monsters, that may be imagined, but never yet were seen; "whose teeth are swords, and their jaw-teeth knives."—The expression, (12) "washed from their filthiness," is peculiarly emphatical; and strongly implies, that there is a loathsome filthiness in human nature; and that none are pure in the sight of God, but those who are washed from it, "by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost;" for, depravity of nature and heart, rather than crimes actually committed, seem intended; though both may be implied. (Note, 1 Cor. vi. 9-11.)

V. 15, 16. The horse-leech, or blood-sucker, gorges blood, and having emptied itself, craves more: and sometimes even sucks till it bursts. "The leech hath two forks in her tongue, which here he calleth her daughters; whereby she sucketh blood and is never satiate; even so are the covetous extortioners insatiable." The two daughters of the horse-leech, however, may mean, the insatiable love of money, and the insatiable love of those pleasures that money purchases: or covetousness, whether to hoard or spend; and blood-thirstiness which powerful and cruel oppressors and rapacious warriors exercise, who are not satisfied, but thirst for more, after all they have shed. Or they may denote in general the insatiable nature of man's sinful propensities, which always grow more craving by indulgence. (Marg. Ref.) The same kind of expression is used in several places: and the emblems, though striking, need no comment.

V. 17. The man who derideth his parents, because of the infirmities of old age, and despiseth their authority, will expose himself to the severest judgments of God. Many of this vile character have come to an untimely end; and have been gibbeted, or left unburied, till the 22 For ^t a servant when he reigneth; and ^u a fool when he is filled with meat;

23 For ^v an odious woman when she is married; and ^v an hand-maid that is heir to her mistress.

24 [¶] There be four things which are ^z little upon the earth, but they are [‡] exceeding wise:

ravens or eagles have picked out their eyes, or devoured their flesh; and all of the same description may expect a similar doom.

V. 18—20. The path of the eagle through the air, that of the serpent on the rock, and that of the ship through the sea, cannot be traced, nor doth any one exactly follow another in the same course. So, artful men insinuate themselves into the affections of young women, and seduce them to their ruin, by an almost infinity of stratagems which can never be all unravelled. Thus also the adulterous wife uses much ingenuity to impose on her husband, to shun detection, and to escape shame and punishment, by schemes and devices which cannot all be enumerated. Every new crime intended, or committed, gives rise to some new artifice; as the ship, in some degree, deviates every time from the course which it steered before. The object of the seducer is to prevail over his prey, and that of the adulteress, to conceal her guilt: and the whole extent of their subtlety and ingenuity is employed to effect those purposes.

V. 21—23. The following events create much disturbance in the world, and should therefore be avoided or prevented as much as possible. When men of low extraction and base spirit obtain authority, they are apt to be imperious, tyrannical, rapacious, and cruel; they grow intoxicated by their sudden elevation, jealous of every one as if harbouring designs against them, impatient of control, fierce in their resentments, and exorbitant in their exactions: and thus nations are disquieted, embroiled in wars, burdened with excessive taxes, or shocked with bloody executions. When foolish and violent men eat and drink to excess, their impertinence, scurrility, impiety, contentiousness, or obscenity, render them a vexation and an insupportable burden, to every company into which they find admission. When a woman of a contentious disposition, and prone to odious vices, is married, her folly and wickedness will be the disquietude of her husband and his family; and he will probably repent of his improper choice, even if he had a large dowry with her. And when a female servant succeeds to the substance of her mistress, or rather supplants her in the affections of her husband, and influences him to divorce his wife, and then to marry her:

When this has been the case, or even if she succeeds a deceased mistress, as married to her husband, she will frequently disquiet the family by her insolence or rapacity, by appropriating all that she can to herself and those belonging to her; to the injury of those to whom it more properly belongs.

V. 24—28. The instinctive wisdom of these four animals is mentioned as a lesson to the reader, who should learn to estimate men, not by their external greatness or magnificence, but by their wisdom. The ants are wise in diligently providing against the winter; the conies, (or mountain-mice, as some think,) in forming refuges to themselves against the weather and from their pursuers; the locusts in their regular and unanimous movements, as if they did every thing by consent and for the common good; and the spider, in her ingenuity and assiduity in forming her webs against the walls, as if she took hold of them with hands; in renewing her work, when repeatedly destroyed; and in seeking and waiting for her prey with patient attention, wherever it is to be found; for which purpose she even enters into king's palaces, whose greatness and delicacy cannot exclude so mean and unwelcome a guest. From all these four, some have noted, that an abridgment may be made of all that is necessary for the conservation of a kingdom in good estate: where first, care must be taken for provision of food; then for secure and commodious dwelling; then that there be concord and agreement; and lastly, that industry and ingenious arts be encouraged. (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 29—31. There are also three, or rather four things, whose motion is majestic, and which go after a goodly manner. (Bp. Patrick.) The four are remarkable for the comeliness or propriety of their going. The lion, conscious of his strength and courage, marches on, and does not alter his pace, or quit his path, for those that meet or pursue him. The greyhound, (some think the war-horse was meant,) is ready for his course, and performs it with great celerity and activity. The he-goat goes before the flock, as one careful about them, attentive to their safety: and the king who adverts to the dignity of his own character, and represses with vigour such as venture to rise up against him.

V. 32, 33. The mention of the king, against whom there is no rising up, seems to have suggested this concluding caution. If any one had foolishly taken too much on himself in the presence of the king, or had entertained thoughts of insurrection, or had harboured resentment or given offence, his wisest course would be to keep silence from all rash or provoking words, and even from excuses, and from charging the blame on others ; and to appear sorry and humbled for what had passed. For, as in common affairs, causes produce their known effects, and the churning of the milk or cream is observed to produce butter, and the violent wringing of the nose to bring forth blood : so, it hath always been observed, that the forcing of wrath by contemptuous or virulent words or actions, occasions the most mischievous and implacable contentions.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-9.

In proportion as we become acquainted with God and ourselves, with his will and our own hearts and actions, we shall be sensible of our sinfulness, ignorance, and weakness. And the experienced and considerate believer, knowing more of himself than he does of others, can sometimes scarcely suppose it possible, that there should be such evils in their hearts as he finds in his own ; or that they should be so insensible, forgetful, or unteachable, as he is. On these occasions he will readily say, "Surely I am more brutish than any man, and have not the understanding of a man." The wisdom or knowledge of fallen man is not his own ; he hath not learned it of himself, but hath received it of God ; and by increasing knowledge, men attain deeper convictions of the immense disproportion which there is betwixt the little which they do understand, and that boundless extent of being with which they have no acquaintance. They perceive also the indistinctness and inaccuracy of their knowledge : they are continually detecting themselves in mistakes ; and even the errors of others, who were on many accounts their superiors, tend to convince them, that "Here they see through a glass darkly," and "have not learned wisdom, and have not attained to the knowledge of the Holy." The sublimity and immensity of such subjects, compared with man's capacities, his present confined opportunities, his short space for making observations and gaining experience, convince the humble Christian "that such knowledge is too high for him, he cannot attain unto it." So that ignorance and want of thought are the true causes of men's dogmatical self-confidence and conceit of their own knowledge. For who hath explored, or comprehended the works of Him, "that hath established all the ends of the earth ?" Who can fathom the deep mysteries of the divine nature, or find out the Almighty to perfection ? Who can "know the Son, but the Father, or the Father but the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal him ?" He indeed came down from heaven to declare to men the name and character of JEHOVAH : and now, ascended into heaven, he hath opened the way of acceptance and access to all believers. Happy then is he who "counts all but loss for "the excellency of the knowledge of Christ," and of the Father through the Son. This knowledge is communicated by his word, which is pure and infallible, in which there is no dross, no error, no deficiency, no redundancy. May we believe his testimony, embrace his invitations, plead his promises, observe his directions, and keep his commandments ; and then we shall be wise unto salvation, and at length "know even as we are known : " and in the mean time, we shall trust in him, and he will be a Shield unto us from all our enemies round about. But let us not want to be wise above what is written, or to add man's vain reasonings and presumptuous inventions to the truths of God ; lest he reprove us, and we be found liars and deceivers. For the desire of knowledge is as capable of exorbitance as any other inclination of our fallen nature, and is productive of the most dreadful effects ; whilst men, proud of their own wisdom, prefer their own conjectures to the infallible testimony of God, and "speak perverse things to draw away disciples after them," who "will utterly perish in their own delusions." Against such perils faith in the promises of God, and fervent prayer, form our only security. In coming to his mercy-seat, we should always consider the near approach of death, and its eternal consequences. Then the time of prayer will be over ; and we should therefore be the more earnest to obtain our requests before we die, and to be preserved from sin and temptation till we die. We should be particular, as well as urgent in our supplications : yet all the variety of them may be reduced to two heads, ' Things needful for the soul, and things needful for this present life.' But the former should have the decided preference ; and the latter should be sought in entire subserviency. If we be far removed from vanity and lies, if we be interested in the pardoning love of God, and have him as our Portion ; if we be preserved from delusions and overwhelming temptations ; if we walk with God, and live in communion with him, and can commit our souls into his hands at death, and have an entrance into "the everlasting kingdom

CHAP. XXXI.

King Lemuel instructed by his mother to avoid whoredom and drunkenness ; and to use his wealth and authority for the relief and protection of the poor and oppressed, 1—9. And concerning

“ of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ : ” then we shall have all that we can ask or think, in all our varied prayers and supplications, as far as they relate to ourselves. It does not indeed behoove us to be so explicit in respect of temporal things : but if we suppose one situation to be more exempt from temptation than another, we may properly pray for it. Should the Lord please to prove us with deep poverty, we ought not to murmur, and we may expect grace sufficient to resist the powerful temptations of such a condition. But if we know the deceitfulness of our own hearts, and consider what it would be to suffer hunger, cold, and the want of all things ; we shall perceive, that temptations to dishonesty would have a mighty force in them ; and we cannot tell, but we might be led from smaller to greater transgressions, till we arrived at such degrees of guilt as we now shudder to think of. We may, in this view, therefore, in humble submission, pray to be preserved from poverty, and to be fed with food convenient for us. On the other hand, when we consider how affluence tends to pride, indolence, self-indulgence, and a worldly mind ; how they, who are fed to the full and surrounded by abundance, are prone to abuse the gift and forget the Giver, and refuse obedience to him : we cannot pray to be made rich without contradicting the petition which our Lord himself hath taught us, “ Lead us not into temptation. ” We are indeed commonly apt to think that we should be able to behave properly, and to do much good, if we were made richer ; but this only proves the pride and folly of our hearts. For it is the hardest thing in the world to act wisely in great prosperity : and the greatest triumph of grace seems to be the conversion of very rich people ; and the preserving of them humble, spiritual, dead to the world, devoted to God, and good stewards of the unrighteous mammon, in the midst of all their incentives to the contrary vices. So that it will ever be found a wise prayer, though but seldom offered. “ Give me not riches, lest I “ be full and deny thee, and say, Who is the LORD ? ” The more advanced Christian will sincerely and frequently present it : every true believer can fervently pray, “ LORD, let me never have more riches, than thou shalt enable me ‘ to use to thy glory. ’ ” And we all ought to be, and doubtless many of us are, thankful, if we enjoy that mediocrity, which we are here taught by the Holy Spirit to consider as the safest and happiest condition in life. But how contrary is this to the almost universal eagerness of men after riches ! In fact, the wisdom of God and the wisdom of the world are diametrically opposite ; and, alas ! there is but a scanty measure of divine wisdom even amongst the majority of Christians.

V. 10—33.

It is no small attainment in heavenly wisdom, habitually and diligently to attend on the duties of our own station ; and never to intermeddle with other men’s concerns, unless to do them good. It is base to create any one needless uneasiness : but it is peculiarly cruel wantonly to increase the sufferings of the needy, the helpless, or the oppressed ; and thus also to tempt them to sin, and to imprecate divine vengeance on their calumniators. We need not, however, wonder, that we see around us numbers living in the grossest iniquities ; as there always has been a generation of such, the seed of the serpent and the children of the wicked one. But we should mourn over them, pray for them, and protest against them. Doubtless they who curse, and deride, and despise their parents, will bring upon themselves both temporal and eternal destruction, except they repent of this their most aggravated wickedness : nor will Pharisaical or Antinomian self-deceivers, who are pure in their own eyes, but are not cleansed from their filthiness : or the proud and haughty, who exalt themselves, and look down with contempt on their neighbours ; or cruel extortioners and oppressors, escape the vengeance of God. Let the generation of God’s children manifest a contrary spirit, in every respect. Let such as have parents and superior relations, behave with submission and respect to them, continually blessing and praying for them : yea, let us all be subject one to another, in the several relations of life, and be clothed with humility. In the consciousness of our remaining defilement, let us seek daily to be more and more cleansed from our filthiness, and yet to be more abased in our own eyes, and more gentle, affable, and lowly in our deportment among men : and instead of devouring the poor and needy, let us study to protect, relieve, and comfort them, to the extent of our ability. In order to this, we must beware of covetousness and profuseness, which, like the two daughters of the horse-leech, evermore cry, Give, give, but never have any thing to spare : and we must learn to habituate every one of our inclinations to brook denial ; otherwise no emblem in nature will adequately illustrate their insatiable cravings. — Whilst we behold, with grief and wonder, the subtlety and wicked ingenuity with which the ungodly seduce, debauch, deceive, and ruin one another and themselves ; let us guard against their snares ; and consider the capacities of our minds as given us, that we may employ all our contrivances and sagacity in devising how to do good. But let the ingenious and successful workers of iniquity, who manage to escape the detection of man, remember that they cannot elude the all-seeing eye, or escape the dreadful judgment of God. The miseries of the world arise in a great measure from the ill behaviour of men, in those stations to which they are called. This, however, is often owing to the wickedness and folly of those concerned, who advance mean and worthless upstarts to authority, and put it in their power to be the plague of whole nations. The erroneous choice also and treatment of companions, and the wrong motives which influence men in marrying, or in disposing of their property, fill society and domestic life with great disquietude. But let every one mortify in himself those odious dispositions, and avoid that evil conduct, which in many cases almost render life insupportable : for who would choose to be a curse to society, and to all connected with him ? Let us also look around, and avail ourselves of every hint suggested to us even by the animal tribes. We may learn foresight, industry, and perseverance from the ant ; from the conies to provide security against approach-the character and value of the virtuous woman, 10—31.

ing dangers; from the locusts to be contented in our proper station, and to do all things in harmony and peace; and from the spider to employ our ingenuity and patient assiduity wherever we are, not in useless trifles, but in those things which pertain to our sustenance and well-being. And the sermons of these despicable insects will condemn numbers for their improvidence and sloth, their sin and folly. The Christian may also learn from the lion to be bold in the path of duty, and not to turn aside for any man; from the grey-hound or horse, to be ever ready and active, and cheerful in running the race set before him; from the he-goat, to be the guide, overseer, and example of his family, and to take proper care of them; and from the king not to act inconsistently with the dignity of his character, not to suffer any of his passions to rebel and prevail against him. But, alas, how often have we risen up against God our King! We have done foolishly, in thus lifting up ourselves and in thinking evil against him. Let us then lay our hands upon our mouths, and abase ourselves before him; and not further provoke his wrath, by our impenitent and persevering wickedness. Having found peace with him, let us follow peace with all men: and let us always remember the connexion between the means and the end. For, as in the ordinary concerns of life, some means generally produce desirable effects, whilst others terminate in pain and trouble: so, no spiritual blessings can be obtained by those who neglect the appointed means; nor are they ever sincerely used in vain: and if men will waste their time in those books, diversions, and vanities, which are the means of lulling the conscience and hardening the heart, surely the end will be answered, and the wrath of God will be the dreadful consequence.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXI. V. 1. Some think that Solomon was meant under the name of Lemuel, and that Bathsheba called him by this name. But others, with greater probability, suppose Lemuel to have been some neighbouring prince, whose mother perhaps was a pious Israelite. Indeed the use of Chaldean words, in this chapter, and in no other part of the book, affords a cogent argument that it was written by another hand, and probably at a later period than the proverbs of Solomon: but whether it was added to this book, by the men of Hezekiah, or after the captivity, is not certain. However, Lemuel retained the early instructions of his mother, and published them for the benefit of others: and as they were allowed to be a prophecy, or given by inspiration of God, they were at length inserted at the close of this book.

V. 2. Perhaps Lemuel's mother observed in his conduct some indications of a propensity to those evils, against which she warned him; and this excited her grief and surprise, and caused her thus to expostulate with him: as if she had said, 'What, my son, shall I have no other

'recompense for my pain and sorrow, and my care of thy education, no other answer to my prayers and vows, 'than to see thee enslaved to ruinous lusts, and become a 'scourge to thy people?' Or the verse may be considered as an animated call to him to attend to her instructions, which sprang from the tenderness of maternal affection, 'What shall I say, my son, the most effectually to impress thy mind? Shall I plead with thee the anguish I 'have endured for thee; or my early dedication of thee to 'the Lord, with vows and prayers; or my tender solicitude 'about thy future welfare?"

V. 3. The company of licentious women tends to enfeeble both body and mind, and to unfit men for the duties of their station. If then Lemuel should yield to this temptation, he would be disqualified for the duties of a king. His time and thoughts, which ought to be otherwise employed, would be thus engrossed; and he would gradually be drawn aside into those ways of indolence, indulgence, and negligence; and led to make those sacrifices of the interests of his kingdom and the affections of his people, to please some favourite concubine, which have in unnumbered instances proved destructive to princes, who otherwise had the prospect of reigning happily.

V. 4—7. "It is not for kings, O Lemuel, to drink wine: or for rulers to desire strong drink." Kings and magistrates should be more scrupulously temperate than other men, in proportion to the importance of their offices: for if they cloud their understanding with wine, they will be apt to forget or mistake the statutes by which they should judge, or be induced by designing men to commit injustice. This is the more aggravated, because the poor and afflicted are chiefly injured! their cause may be deemed worthy of little notice; nay, perhaps decided against them, and even their lives sacrificed to oblige some powerful oppressor, who is the companion of the ruler in his revels. On the contrary, strong drink should be administered as a cordial to those who are ready to faint through weakness or weariness, and to cheer the spirits of the dejected, that they may be raised above the depressing sense of their poverty and misery. Some think, that by "him that is ready to perish," the condemned criminals are meant, to whom it was customary to give a draught of wine, or other strong drink, when led to execution.

V. 8, 9. Magistrates ought to be the counsellors and protectors of the oppressed, and of all who are unable or afraid to plead their own cause. They should quash malicious prosecutions, decide in favour of the injured party, and detect and expose the oppressors; and thus deliver the poor and needy who were appointed to destruction, and judge righteously without respect of persons.—'If thou seest a man in danger to lose his right, because he 'is not able to make it out; and through fear, or ignorance, or want of elocution, cannot speak for himself, 'keep not silence, but undertake his defence; especially

‘if it be the cause of strangers, who understand not the ‘laws; and perhaps are in danger to suffer some great ‘trick.)

V. 10. This description of a virtuous woman forms a kind of poem, containing twenty-two verses, of which each in succession begins with a different letter of the Hebrew alphabet. It seems to have been composed by the mother of Lemuel, and might be intended to direct him in the choice of a wife: but it contains many important lessons to various descriptions of persons in every age.
The interrogation implies both the scarceness of such vir-tuous women, and the happiness of him who had found one for his wife; (Note, xviii. 22.) The word rendered virtuous, may imply both health and mental endowments, as well as the good dispositions and conduct of the person described. ‘The word signifies both strength, (or rather ‘courage.) and riches, and virtue. Jethro uses it, Ex.
‘xviii. 21. which we translate able men; and then follows ‘more particularly wherein their ability should consist,
‘“Such as fear God, men of truth, hating covetousness:”
‘I take therefore the word to include a great fear of God ‘(mentioned afterwards, 30,) which is so powerful, as to ‘endue one with courage to do well, when piety is con‘temned, nay, laughed at and abused. (Bp. Patrick.) The same word is used when Boaz says to Ruth, “All the city “of my people do know that thou art a virtuous woman.”
(Ruth iii. 11:) where the context seems to fix the meaning: for, her unblemished character, her piety and virtue, must be especially intended. The character is drawn with reference to the usages of those days; but the general outlines are equally suitable to every age and nation. Perhaps it was no more than an ideal picture of feminine excellence; and living characters were to be estimated according to the degree in which they resembled it.

V. 11. The husband of such a wife, would so entirely confide in her conjugal fidelity and in her prudent management, that he could have no jealousy of her, but would trust all his domestic concerns to her without reserve.
And every thing being conducted with economy, he would not be tempted to unjust methods of getting gain; as they often are whose affairs are deranged, and whose substance is wasted, by an extravagant woman.

V. 12. ‘She will endeavour to please him in every ‘thing; and by avoiding whatever is ungrateful,’ (or dis‘agreeable,) to him, nay, by deserving well of him, and ‘studying to promote the interests of him and his family, ‘to maintain his honour and reputation; and that not only ‘by fits and starts, and when in a good humour, but all the ‘days of her life; even after he is dead, if she survive ‘him.’ (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 13—29. Though we are led to conceive of this virtuous woman, as of one in a superior station, and such a wife as Lemuel would be happy in finding; yet she is described as peculiarly industrious, and as taking pleasure in manual labour; rising early to superintend her household, that all might have their provisions in due time, in order to their attendance on their several employments.
Her wool, flax, spindle, and distaff, are mentioned to her honour; whilst the delicacy and ornaments of the daughters of Zion, are by the prophet recorded to their shame. (Is.
iii. 16—26.) By her diligence and good management, this virtuous woman is represented as able to provide every thing in abundance, of the best quality, and at the best market; and thus, like the merchants’ ships, bringing her food from far. The gains of her industry enable her to purchase fields and plant vineyards: and thus also she manages her affairs with prudence and consideration.
She does not shrink from labour, but as exercise gives her strength, so she readily exerts it in any profitable employment. She takes care that all she has to dispose of be completed in the best manner; and that all which she buys be good of the kind: and though she arose early, yet tasting the pleasure and profit of industry, she is not in haste to retire to rest, but spends the evening after it is dark in useful occupations: nay, the whole, or a great part of the night, when the case requires it. Yet her diligence springs not from covetousness: but she desires to have enough and to spare for the poor; and her charity is maintained by her industry and frugality. Her family are prepared for the inclemency of the winter, by having double garments, or changes of raiment; clothes in plenty, and suitable to their stations: her own clothing is good,
and becoming her rank, but of her own manufacturing:
and her husband is known amongst the assembled elders, by his decent and respectable appearance, and by his cheerful aspect: and besides all this plenty, she disposes of many valuable articles to the merchants. Thus her health and vigour of mind are preserved, and her reputation established: and her life is spent in so useful a manner, that she will be enabled in time to come to reflect upon it with comfort. Her conversation also is prudent and pious, cheerful and friendly: kindness dictates and wisdom directs all that she says: or she speaks according to the divine law, which requires love and gentleness: and she neither wastes her own time in idleness, nor allows any of her household to do so; nor yet to want any thing that is good for them.

 Her children, well educated and provided for, grow up to be a credit to her; and repay her attention by their commendations of and prayers for her; and her husband, with heartfelt satisfaction, expatiates in her praise, saying with gladness of heart, "Many daughters of Adam and Abraham have done virtuously, but thou excellest them all."
 The word virtuously is the same as is used above.

V. 30, 31. The favour shown to young women, on account of external embellishments or polite accomplishments, or of their wit, gayety, rank, or wealth; with all the flattering compliments and professions of love made to them, are deceitful, and will soon turn into neglect or disgust, if they do not possess more solid excellences.
 And beauty, though so much admired and extolled, is a mere fading vanity; it adds nothing to present happiness:
 it often covers and augments the deformity of a worthless mind; it exposes the possessor to numberless snares, and proves a dangerous temptation to others: and it soon fades, and leaves nothing but the pride and folly which it fostered, without any foundation for esteem and durable affection:
 and they who marry a worthless woman on this account, will surely experience how vain it is. But a woman who fears God, and conscientiously attends to the duties of her station, will grow into the esteem and affection of her husband, and acquire merited and durable respect and commendation. Every one ought to behave to her according to the good effects of her conduct to her relations and the community; and she is worthy to be noticed with commendation in the public assemblies of the state, as one whose good works render her peculiarly an useful member of society: and should every tongue be silent, her own conduct will sufficiently manifest her worth, and establish her reputation with all competent judges. 'Thus is shut up

 ' this looking-glass for ladies, which they are desired to ' open, and dress themselves by: and if they do so, "their ' adorning will be found to praise, and honour, and glory,
 " at the appearing of Jesus Christ." (Henry.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

The affectionate instructions and counsels of prudent and pious mothers may be as useful to the minds of their children, as the tender care of them is to their bodies. And when we consider that they who occupy the most important stations in the community, often receive the first impressions from their mothers, which are generally very durable: we shall perceive how much the interest of mankind is connected with the due performance of the maternal duty; and of what importance it is that women be so educated, as to be qualified for such a charge. Those children who are early devoted unto God, in baptism, and by fervent prayers, and who have been educated accordingly, may be exhorted and persuaded upon that ground, in ac-turn they will make to such kind friends, and what use of their salutary admonitions. They, who have the prospect of succeeding to high authority, should be educated and cautioned with the greater care: because their conduct will have so extensive an effect upon others; and they should especially be warned against those vices to which they will certainly be most tempted. Such noble and royal youths are sure to have abundance of flatterers; who will persuade them that their rank authorizes them to indulge their passions, and that they are not to be restricted like their inferiors. It is therefore well for them to have affectionate and prudent monitors to inculcate other lessons. For such princes, as have "given their strength to wine," and as have inflamed their passions, vitiated their judgments, and enfeebled both body and mind by excesses, have not only forgotten the law, perverted judgment, and become tyrants and oppressors; but they have gone into those ways, which have terminated in their ruin: and history abounds with instances of this kind, which are set up as beacons to warn others to shun the rocks on which they split. On the other hand, they who have studied the welfare of their people, and have used their authority to protect the innocent and to defend the oppressed; have best secured their own interest, establishment, and reputation. But if exact temperance and impartial rectitude become kings and judges, they are equally requisite for the ministers of religion: for if they forget the law of God, or pervert his truth, the consequences will be still more dreadful to themselves and others. The many awful instances there have been of promising men, who have been disgraced and ruined by women and wine, should warn every one, who bears the sacred character, to avoid all approaches to, and appearances of, these evils. Every creature of God is good; and strong drink, though wretchedly abused, has yet its use; but instead of wasting it in excess, they who can afford it, should dispense it to the diseased and the wretched, that by the moderate use of it, they may be refreshed and relieved: "let them drink" and forget their poverty, and remember their misery no "more." By the same rule, commendation and consolatory topics should be used as cordials to the dejected and tempted. But when they are administered to the confident and self-sufficient, they operate as wine on those who are already intoxicated. And by parity of reason, as magistrates should plead for such as cannot plead for themselves; so we should all use the gifts we possess, for the benefit of others, to supply their deficiencies, and to preserve them from oppression or destruction.

V. 10—31.

As we have repeatedly in this book been warned against the seductions of bad women; there is a peculiar propriety, in its concluding with the character and commendations of the virtuous woman for the confutation of such as indiscriminately censure the sex, and speak against marriage, though it is God's own institution. In the fallen state of human nature, it is no wonder that but few, either men or women, are in any good measure what they ought to be; and various causes concur in rendering women what they ought not to be. But it is of vast importance, that a standard should be fixed, by which all who regard the word of God, may estimate the intrinsic value of the female character. Some there are to be found, who in a good degree answer to this description: yea, many daughters have done virtuously; every one of them is far more valuable than rubies, and happy is he, to whom the Lord gives such a prize. Whilst his heart safely trusts in her, she will do him good, in every sense, as long as she liveth; and conduce to his comfort, interest, credit, and safety from snares and temptations. But when we carefully consider this standard of feminine excellency, in which conjugal fidelity, economy, industry, cheerful attention to household affairs, and to the good government of servants and education of children, with a regard to the interests of her husband, are united with charity, piety, wisdom, and the fear of God; in which avarice and extravagance are equally avoided, and the due distance is preserved betwixt penuriousness and waste, betwixt ostentation and slovenly neglect; and in which no mention is made of time spent in those vain amusements and decorations, which seem the only business of multitudes; but the whole life is employed, and the thoughts and conversation occupied about, the duties to be performed to God and man: I say, when this character is well considered, and contrasted with the admitted and accomplished females around us; the mind must be impressed with surprise, and led to many interesting inquiries. Numbers in the different ranks of life may be found, any where, except in their own families, or in the house of God: they are adorned with every thing, except wisdom and grace: they affect to know many things, but would not even be thought to understand those which are the proper duties of their station. Nay, they leave even their own offspring to the care of mercenaries, that they may be totally disengaged, and at liberty for vanity and dissipation! But which of the two characters is most amiable, rational, or useful? Which is the best fitted for the important duties of a wife and mother? Indeed, the matter admits not of a question. At first glance we perceive how much ancient simplicity excelled modern refinement: and how far the wisdom of God's word surpasses the devices of men! We cannot but lament, that the modern education of females is such, as seems intended to form them useless triflers, fit only to be gazed upon, or made subservient to amusement and pleasure. And how can they, who spend the night in dissipation, the morning in sleep, and the evening in dressing, "rejoice in time to come," when they review a life so wretchedly wasted? When they grow old, it cannot be expected that the children, whom they neglected for the sake of the most trivial pursuits, will rise up and call them blessed: and in general the hearts of their husbands can by no means trust in them; they are a grief and trouble to them all their days; and they are frequently the only persons from whom they receive no commendation. And what the end of a life thus spent will be, if also thus ended, needs not be told: then at least it will be found, that "favour was deceitful, and beauty vain." But "a woman that feareth the LORD," will then receive due commendation, and according to the fruit of her hands it will be given her; and her own works will praise her in the gates. Of this honour, which cometh from God, every one ought to be ambitious: and according to this standard we all ought to regulate our judgments. With this before their eyes, let pious parents educate their children, especially their daughters; and let godly men make choice of such wives, and value them accordingly: and this description let all women daily study, who desire to be durably beloved and respected, and to fill up their station in the community in a useful and honourable manner.
